NOTES OF THE WEEK.

WE shall publish next week the paper on "Theology as affected by the results of Biblical Criticism," read by the Rev. R. B. Drummond, B.A., of Edinburgh, on Tuesday, at the Conference of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association at Newcastle-on-Tyne.

ON Wednesday, at the Memorial Hall, Manchester, an address was presented to Mr. Alderman Harry Rawson, and his portrait, painted by Sir George Reid, P.S.A., was presented to the trustees of the Memorial Hall, and a copy of the portrait to Mrs. Rawson. Mr. F. Monks presided, and there was a large attendance of friends, which included the Lord Mayor. A letter of warm appreciation and sympathy was read from the Principal and Professors of Manchester College, Oxford. We hope next week to publish a full report of this presentation, and must be content to add here a word of most cordial congratulation to Mr. Rawson and to the trustees of the Memorial Hall on having secured a portrait of one to whom the city of Manchester and the cause of Liberal Religion are so deeply indebted. THE INQUIRER also has reason to be grateful to Mr. Rawson for helpful services rendered through a long course of years.

THE Church Congress has been held this week in Northampton. Any comment which we may make on its proceedings must be held over until next week. The selection committee has evidently tried, as far as possible, to provide topics which shall command general interest without arousing party passion. To conciliate and disarm the strong force of Protestants which might be expected to attend in that centre, prominent High Churchmen were rigorously excluded from the programme of speakers. Education was, of course, an inevitable subject; but as little time as might be was assigned to it. Other matters of general church polity to be discussed were "Home Reunion," which does not seem very near in these days; "The Church in South Africa," where the cause of Colenso seems to have suffered final defeat; and "Church Reform." The Broad Churchmen will have had their chance of speaking out on "The Position and Responsibility of the Clergy and Laity in Relation to Modern Criticism of the Bible and its Influence on Theology," and more specifically on "The Miracles and Supernatural Character of the Gospels." Social work was represented by sessions on "The Moral Teaching of the Sermon on the Mount as applied to Social Obligations," "Church Work among Sailors," and "The Temperance Problem." Two subjects only seem fraught with danger of violent collision between parties —"Worship in the Church of England" and "The Direction of Individuals in Spiritual Matters."

THE Church Congress grows in importance every year. It is already a greater instrument for moulding and directing opinion in the Church of England than Convocation, the Right Reverend Bench in the House of Lords, and the Diocesan Conferences combined. It serves year by year to mark the resultant of the various diagonal forces in the Church, which are themselves represented by such associations as the English Church Union and their organs in the Press. And these societies, as well as the Congress itself, are all extra-official. They have no recognised standing in either ecclesiastical or civil theory. We cannot help speculating upon the extent to which this tendency may run. It is easily conceivable that it may finally result in an entire reshaping of the methods of Church government. If disestablishment should happen, as is quite possible, before long, the progress of this movement might be more rapid. Men already born might live to see the Anglican Bishop regarded, not as the chief magistrate of a diocese, invested with spiritual authority, and backed by the law-courts, but rather as the president of just such a voluntary Parliament as our own Provincial Assemblies or National Conference. If, alongside this development, the orthodox Churches go on learning heresy at their present rate, and the atomistic Churches learn organisation, we may slip after a generation or two into Reunion on lines which will seem as inevitable in retrospect as they seem Utopian in prospect.

THE Baptist Union has met this week in Birmingham, and unanimously passed a strong resolution condemning the Education Bill, while a further resolution pledging members to refuse payment of the rate was passed by an overwhelming majority. The Rev. J. R. Wood, in his Presidential address, declared that the Baptists, with their brethren of the other Free Churches, would not submit to the Education Bill.

If we cannot destroy the Bill inside Parliament, we will do it outside, by an appeal to that love of justice always found in the British people. Men in power may stop the clock at Westminster, but the sun keeps his time; unrighteous decrees may be made, but in God's world they cannot stand. We must work and pray to keep the young life of England from the blight of clerical domination, for a priest-ridden people can never be in the van of progress.

THE autumnal meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, the Sunday School Association, and the District Missionary Association at Newcastle-on-Tyne, were well reported in the local Press, and the Newcastle Daily Chronicle on Monday devoted a leading article to the subject, marked by a very welcome tone of sympathy and appreciation. The conclusion of the article we are glad to reproduce here:—

> The leaders of Unitarianism have rendered to religious liberty services that form a noble justification of the origin of their Church; and on all essentials they remain true to their principles. Their services are recognised and appreciated by many who do not agree with their theology. While the proceedings of the Conference which is held this week will not be of that demonstrative sort which makes an appeal to the general public, there is no doubt that they will be followed with interest by the leaders and members of other religious denominations. In our day there is much competition between Churches, and the preacher is tempted to have recourse to the methods of the advertiser, and occasionally adopts expedients which, it is to be feared, may be regarded as offending the finer sense of decorum. That is a charge which can hardly be made against the exponents of Unitarianism. As teachers, they claim to follow the methods of the patient builder, and to have more faith in gradual growth and development than in spasmodic endeavour. Yet, in an age when, according to Henry Drummond's piquant phrase, many feel that they can escape doubt on the verities of religion only by escaping thought, Unitarianism ought to make a stronger appeal to the thinking classes than it does. Its adherents hope that their cult will make a deeper impression on the future than it has in the past. That, of course, is a hope that can be verified only by the future. But whatever may be our opinions concerning its creed, or, as some perhaps would say, its want of a creed, Unitarianism has cut an ineffaceable furrow on the field of thought, and we welcome its representatives to our city.

Although a day behind the fair, we desire to call attention to a wise and suggestive address on "The Difficulties in the Way of Belief which Beset Young People," delivered by the Rev. W. B. Selbie, B.A., of Cambridge, before the Congregational Union at its session in Glasgow, and printed in full in last week's Examiner, for a great deal that Mr. Selbie has to say applies as much to the young people of our churches as to those in the Congregational Union. The great difficulties are (1) Indifference born of the practical materialism of modern life; (2) that character inside the church is seen by the keen eye of the young to be no better in many cases than character outside; (3) the influence of modern Biblical criticism which has to a large extent destroyed the authority with which once the Bible spoke; (4) the low intellectual standard to be found in many pulpits which do not keep pace with the growth of education in the pews; and, as a necessary result of intellectual feebleness, (5) the inadequacy of much of our apologetic. This last Mr. Selbie would largely replace by the apologetic of religious experience. Readers of Mr. James's remarkable book on "Varieties of Religious Experience" will remember that it is on experience he founds his great argument for religion. This also is the point of Mr. Percy Gardner's paper which leads off the new Hibbert Journal. Mr. Selbie will find in these voices from Oxford and Harvard powerful witnesses to his plea for the value of experience as the most convincing apologetic the Church can offer.

We are glad to note that Mr. Selbie frankly recognises that the Bible can no more be for the young the supreme and unquestioned religious guide which their fathers and mothers found it. At the same time we join with him in the plea for a constructive rather than negative handling of the Bible, in the belief that modern criticism has really given us a grander and more satisfying Bible than that which rested on the old theory of verbal inspiration. But this is a task for which every preacher needs to gird himself. Mr. Selbie does not believe in the frothy, emotional, anecdotical preaching which is so popular, and yet which drives intelligent young people away. And he utters a needful word of warning against the idea that to keep young people attached to our churches we must have recourse to amusements, &c. "One reason why some of our brightest sons and daughters fight shy of the churches is that they are too big"—too sensible and intelligent—"to be coddled in this way." Mr. Selbie's address is calculated to give many Churches and ministers a time of painful but wholesome heart-searching.

The Times published recently a characteristic article by Dr. Joseph Parker on "A Generation in a City Pulpit." It contains a passage of special interest to believers in open Trusts and undogmatic Church fellowship. Dr. Parker remarks on the easy way in which men of unquestionable sincerity come in the course of time to regard, or disregard, their pledges in the matter of creed and fellowship:—

> When a man deliberately elects to join a body of Christians by solemnly accepting all its fundamental beliefs, is he at liberty to change or modify his faith without giving notice to his co-believers? Would the signing of a commercial partnership deed not require certain obligations to be honourably complied with? I do not object to a man expanding, or even disavowing, any mechanical creed, but I do object to a signature being reduced to a dead letter. The signature should be the man. Let the man, if so minded, change his creed, but at the same time let him not think that he can with honour take orthodox money for teaching heterodox doctrine. Let all things be done in open day. No teacher is, for example, at liberty to teach Unitarian doctrine in a Trinitarian pulpit, or vice versa. For my own part, I would not sign a binding and final creed drawn up by my own hand, because words change their applications, standpoints vary day by day, even atmosphere follows the laws of evolution, and the infinite can never be finally expressed in terms of time and space.

The distinction between toleration and justice in matters of religion was strongly drawn in the following passage of one of Dr. Clifford's recent letters on the question of Lord Halifax's aspiration after reunion with Rome. The secretary of the E.C.U. had intervened, and this is part of Dr. Clifford's response:—

> Mr. Hill, I see, writes about the "large-hearted tolerance" of Lord Halifax "for such men as Dr. Clifford." I confess I do not quite know what that means. I have heard much about "tolerance" in my days. I have read of "Toleration Acts." But Free Churchmen do not ask for "tolerance," "large-hearted," or otherwise. They have had too much of it. They want justice—they ask for equality before the law, for the immediate termination of all class legislation, for the establishment of perfect freedom, and for the reign of equal opportunity for all. It was "tolerance," not particularly "large-hearted," Mr. Balfour gave us when we stated our objections to the Education Bill. The spirit of "tolerance" breathes through this Bill, not the spirit of justice and equality. We are all to pay and then to be "tolerated" observers of clerical control. No, I say with John Richard Green, "I am sick of looking forward to a free England which will appear about a century and a half after I am dead. And so more and more I can't help looking to the West. There is the world as the world will be. There are all the things one hopes for, and cares for, and lives for. There is a people—there, and not here in England." I, too, am weary of the hoary tyrannies and despotic "tolerances" of England, and I wonder when my fellow-countrymen will be just enough and brave enough and educated enough to make a complete end of them and secure for our sons and daughters a really free country. Instead of that we are asked to pass a measure, called an Education Bill, but expressly constructed to increase the powers of Clericalism and to destroy that sturdy independence and stubborn determination to manage our own affairs in our own way which have altogether gone far to make us as free and as great as we are.

In last week's Methodist Times there is a brief notice of a little book called "Through Roman Spectacles." One expected from the title to find a somewhat biassed account of the Roman Catholic version of Christianity such as is given in the unfortunate Roman Catholic Primer, published by the R.T.S. But that this book deals with a wholly different matter was made evident by the following sentence:—"Our Lord and the apostles lived under the Roman Empire, and as subjects of that Empire they constantly came into contact with Romans, Roman law, Roman customs, and therefore viewed many of the facts and circumstances of life through Roman spectacles." The simple humanity of Jesus, and the necessary limitations of his knowledge, could not be more clearly indicated than in those words. The notion of Jesus Christ as one who was merely found in fashion as a man, but without human limitations and characteristics, is everywhere being silently abandoned.

It is often hinted by others, and sometimes admitted by Unitarians themselves, that they have not yet learned to speak to the people; with few exceptions they fail to gain and retain the popular ear. If any Unitarian had strayed into the Central Hall, Manchester, the other Tuesday he would surely have had opportunity to learn. The Rev. Thomas Champness, a very popular Wesleyan preacher and temperance lecturer, preached a sermon, reported at considerable length in the Methodist Weekly, and an astonishing sermon it is. Here is a passage which deals with some of the advantages of going to heaven: it appears that one learns the news there without buying a paper:

> Notice how the other world is up to date with regard to this world. Abraham knew all about it. It is a long gap between Abraham and Moses, but he knew about Moses, and he knew all about this poor fellow being covered with sores and getting nothing, and he knew about the rich man getting everything every day. The next world knows all about this world. What a wide theme now! What do the people who used to live in Manchester think of it? What do the saints who worshipped in Oldham-street Chapel think of the Central Hall? What does Jabez Bunting think? I would give five shillings to know, but I would give ten shillings to know what Richard Watson thinks of the million. (That is the Million Guinea Fund.) They know, don't you forget; they haven't lost anything by going to heaven; they are up to date.

If Mr. Champness means business, there are spirit mediums who will tender the information at the price named. It was, perhaps, to ward off any such proposal that the preacher went on next to attack spiritualism. But if this sort of thing is the Gospel, we have not yet learned it; and if this is the way to speak to the people, most of us will never be able to do it.

We heard on Wednesday with the deepest regret of the death of Mr. John Kensit, at the Liverpool Royal Infirmary, where he had been since he suffered, on Sept. 25, a brutal assault at Birkenhead. The wound he then received is said to have had little or nothing to do with the pneumonia which was the cause of death. Mr. Kensit was notorious as the champion of a militant Protestantism, and the watchful enemy of illegal ritual practices in the Church of England. His son, who is in Walton Gaol for refusing to abstain from open-air demonstrations, was allowed to visit his father before his death. Mr. Kensit, who was a Londoner, was born in 1853.

How many opportunities for doing good in a great or in a small degree are lost through indecision? Whilst we are asking ourselves, "Shall I, or shall I not?" the moment is passed, and the flower of joy which we might have given is withered, and often can no more be revived by tears of penitence.—Anon.

THE NATIVES OF THE TRANSVAAL.

[THE following letter, as will be seen from its date, has been in our hands for some time. The delay in its publication was not due to any want of appreciation on our part of the importance of the subject.—ED. INQ.]

SIR,—As no further communication on this subject appears in your columns this week, I must not longer delay the answer which Mr. Solly so courteously invites.

Enforced Labour.

In the first place let us be quite clear that it is enforced labour, not taxation as such, that we are dealing with. Mr. Solly does indeed suggest that the proposed tax may be no more than "a fair amount to levy on those who wish to live under the protection of our Government," but if that were all, his ethical and social arguments would be irrelevant, because superfluous; and it is evident that he does not himself lay much stress on this possibility. The advocates of the tax, who long and urgently demanded it, made no secret whatever of the fact that it was not as a source of revenue but as an "inducement" to work that the tax was desired. A comparatively light hut tax cannot be relied on to bring the Kaffir to the mines. In old days the Dutch "Emigrant Farmers," when assigning locations to clans, stipulated for a certain amount of labour year by year, which the chief was responsible for finding, and when the practice was objected to as a form of slavery, they answered that it was better and more humane than the English system of taxation, because under the latter the head of the family got the money for the tax out of the labour of his wives and daughters. "We make the men work and the English the women, that is all." (Theal. "Progress of Africa," p. 260.) All the talk about "the dignity of labour" with which the mining magnates interlarded their proposals for a capitation grant, and all Mr. Solly's arguments as to the good the tax will do the natives absolutely assume that the measure is one for establishing a system of enforced labour. If that is indeed the best method possible it furnishes a striking instance of a practice which we condemned on moral grounds in the Dutch, and suppressed by treaty as far as we could, only to adopt it ourselves, as soon as we came into power.

Akin to Slavery.

Enforced labour is a modified form of slavery, felt to be such when we think of the condition of things out of which the Peasant War arose in Germany and the Revolution in France, and feared as such by our own better class of officials in South Africa. I find Sir Richard Martin, for instance, quoted as saying in an official report (C. 8,547, 1897, p. 34):—"I would respectfully suggest that whatever settlement may be made in future concerning the natives they be left free to choose what period of the year they can best be spared at home, and for whom they will work, i.e., to suit themselves as far as they can as to the nature of their employment, wages, treatment, &c. Any other arrangement seems to me to partake of the nature of slavery, which is surely repugnant to the British instinct."

We are establishing in South Africa, then, a system which in principle is that of slavery; and Mr. Solly's (hypothetical) defence of it is the precise defence of slavery which Aristotle put forward. As it is better, he says, for animals to be tame and to come under the protection of man than to live wild, and as it is better for woman to be ruled by man, and as it is better for the body to be ruled by the mind, so it is better for the "slave by nature" who has enough reason to understand reason, though not himself possessing it, to be under the dominion of another. Anyone "whose function is bodily toil and out of whom nothing better than this can come," and who "is capable of being the property of another (which is the very reason why he is so)," is benefited by being made a slave. ("Politics" I. 5.)

Now I do not insist on this identity of principle between slavery and enforced labour in order to settle the question without further argument. In my former letter I anticipated the necessity of reopening what are often regarded as closed questions, and for myself I have always thought that Aristotle's argument is not treated as seriously as it deserves to be. But surely it is of supreme importance that we should not think of a measure that reopens the whole question of slavery, and of arguments in its support which in principle cover the whole case of slavery, as matters of administrative detail which we need hardly challenge.

Motive and Defence.

Let us, however, for the sake of argument, suppose that we are justified in forcing a man to work if it is for his own good that he should do so, and further that we are the judges of whether it is for his good. It will at any rate be admitted that the people who make him work are generally actuated primarily by a desire to further their own advantage. It is not primarily a missionary desire to teach the Kaffir "the dignity of labour" that makes the mining community so eager for the capitation tax. Clearly, then, if resultant good to the Kaffir is the only real justification of the measure, we must exercise the utmost vigilance. When anything is done on one set of grounds and justified on another we must submit the justification to a very close and even suspicious examination.

Let us ask then, first, whether the effects that Mr. Solly desires are likely to be produced by the Kaffirs being induced to work in the mines; second, whether in cases where our primary object is really the good of the natives we consider it possible or advisable to work by legislation towards these good objects; and third, whether any moral evils are likely to arise from it, to be set against the good (if any) that we may look for.

Will the Desired Effects Follow?

What does Mr. Solly hope for, then, from the practical enforcing of Kaffir labour? He says:—"At present, the aim of a young male Kaffir is to earn enough money to buy three or four wives, and after that to live in idleness, subsisting on their labour. This is not a state of things that any of us desire to perpetuate, certainly not in the interests of the Kaffirs themselves."

This is the state of things to be remedied, and the remedy is work in the mines. I turn to Mr. Bryce's account of the Kimberley mines and read:—"When the native has earned the sum he wants—and his earnings accumulate quickly, since he can live upon very little—he takes his wages in English sovereigns, a coin now current through all Africa as far as Tanganyika, goes home to his own tribe, perhaps a month's or six weeks' journey distant, buys two oxen, buys with them a wife, and lives happily, or at least lazily, ever after." ("Impressions of South Africa," p. 199.)

Work in the Mines.

Work in the mines, therefore, seems in itself singularly ill-calculated to secure the end contemplated. If the capitation tax is to check the Kaffir's laziness and polygamy it must be not because it induces him to work in the mines, but because it takes away a good deal of the money that he earns there; and his having to pay it year by year can not prevent him from buying wives and making them work for him, though it may prevent him from living with them "happily, or at least lazily," ever afterwards. The effects in this direction (such as they are) would be increased if the earnings themselves could be reduced—that is to say, if the Kaffirs could be compelled to work longer in order to get their £2 for the State, and could only earn money more slowly afterwards. And, indeed, there is nothing which the mining philanthropists, whose guidance we are following, more devoutly and persistently desire than that this should be brought about. They are never tired of telling us that the wages of the Kaffirs are unnecessarily and ridiculously high. Perhaps we shall be told that this reduction too would be "for their good"; but I do not think Mr. Solly will accept this application of the principle. He will recognise an old friend in it. How often have we been told that it is a bad thing for workmen to have a high wage because "they only spend it in drink"? It is on the same principle that we are asked to grudge the Kaffir his easy earnings because he will "only spend it in wives."

Our Rule in Basutoland.

The fact is that when our primary object really is the good of the natives we adopt very different methods from that of enforced labour, we achieve results very different from those that flow from our great mining centres, and apparently we do not even contemplate in our administration any direct attack on the institutions and habits which Mr. Solly would like to abolish.

To confine ourselves to South Africa, we may take the case of the Basuto reserve. It may, indeed, well be questioned whether it was for the sake of the Basutos that we took them under our protection (at the request of their chief), but I do not think it is fairly open to question that having made ourselves responsible for them we have genuinely attempted to rule them for their own good. The following extracts will give some idea of the principles and results of our rule. I quote Mr. Bryce again (pp. 340 sqq.):—"The chief holds his court at his kraal, in the open air, settles disputes and awards punishments. There are several British magistrates to deal with grave offences, and a force of 220 native police, under British officers.

"As far back as 1855, Moshesh forbade the 'smelling out' of witches, and now the British authorities have suppressed the more noxious or offensive kinds of ceremonies practised by the Kaffirs. Otherwise they interfere as little as may be with the native ways, trusting to time, peace, and the missionaries to secure the gradual civilisation of the people.

. . . . . .

"The women are more backward than the men, because they have been kept in subjection, and their intelligence has remained only half developed. But their condition is improving; men now work with them in the fields, and they demand clothes instead of so much oil, wherewith to smear their bodies. As education becomes more diffused, old heathen customs lose their hold, and will probably in thirty years have disappeared.

"The material progress of the people has been aided by the enactment of stringent laws against the sale of white men's intoxicating liquors, though some of the chiefs show but a poor example of obedience to these laws, the enforcement of which is rendered difficult by the illicit sale which goes on along the frontiers where Basutoland touches the Free State and the eastern part of Cape Colony. The old native arts and industries decline as European goods become cheaper, and industrial training has now become one of the needs of the people. It is an encouraging sign that, under the auspices of Lerothodi, a sum of £3,184 sterling was collected from the tribe in 1895-6 for the foundation of an institution to give such training.

"These facts are encouraging. They show that, so far, the experiment of leaving a native race to advance in their own way, under their own chiefs, but carefully supervised by Imperial officers, has proved successful. A warlike, unstable, and turbulent, although intelligent, people, while increasing fast in wealth and material comfort, has also become more peaceful and orderly, and by the abandonment of its more repulsive customs is passing from savagery to a state of semi-civilisation."

This almost idyllic picture is qualified by insistence of still existing difficulties, dangers and superstitions, but the qualifications in no case call in question the wisdom of the methods, but only insist on their slow and imperfect working, though that working is wholly in the right direction as far as it goes. And note that there is here no attempt whatever to modify such native institutions as polygamy or the practical slavery of women by any direct legislation or industrial pressure. There are plenty of flourishing missionary stations in Basutoland in which, no doubt, monogamy is inculcated; and, as Mr. Solly well observes, the reign of peace must in itself be fatal to any general practice of polygamy, for if war is abolished there will be about as many men as women, so that (though I do not know whether Mr. Solly will follow me here) any such device as taxing a man for extra wives seems hardly necessary in the interests of morality.

Life in Mines.

But thirdly we have to ask whether the mining system under the British Government in Kimberley or as conducted by the initiators of the present legislation when they were subjects of the late Transvaal government is fraught with any special dangers to native morals which we should have to set off against any benefit which might be shown to accrue from it. The answer can scarcely be doubtful.

Mr. Bryce indeed appears to see no great harm even in the Kimberley "compounds," and he mentions without regret that many of the natives of Basutoland go and do their spell of work in the mines and return as capitalists in a small way to their own country. But Mr. Cronwright Schreiner draws a lurid picture of the vices and diseases which are propagated by the conditions at Kimberley, and the demoralising effect which they have upon native society when the miners return to their homes. Mr. Burns, in a great speech in the House of Commons, gave a terrible description of some of the degrading conditions of Kaffir labour in the great mines. It is difficult to do more than distantly hint at some aspects of the question, but assuredly "polygamy" is in itself a very wholesome thing compared with what goes on in Kimberley. So far as I know, however, no one has as yet openly proposed the establishment of the "compound" system at Johannesburg; but Mr. Hobson apparently thinks the conditions which obtained there are at least as bad. He says:—"Apart from the floggings and other brutal ill-treatment in the mines, of which we have official evidence, I have found a virtual unanimity among missionaries and native commissioners as to the demoralising influence which life at the mines, particularly in the Transvaal, is exercising upon native life." ("The War in South Africa," p. 287.)

Dutch and English Administration.

Now the regulations as to natives under the late Transvaal Government did not favour the mining industry. This is the ground of one of Mr. FitzPatrick's most bitter complaints. He tells us ("Transvaal from Within," pp. 102 sqq.) that there was a law providing "that not more than five families may reside upon one farm," and he further declares that the law was not enforced against the farmers, but was (harshly and corruptly, he avers) enforced against the mine-owners, when some of them imported a whole tribe, including women and children—a scheme, on the face of it, free from some of the objections to the current methods. Mr. FitzPatrick attributes this action to Mr. Kruger's rooted objection to the mining industry, and quotes him as saying, "We have enough gold and enough gold-seekers in the country already." All this is intended to show what a hopelessly benighted ruler Mr. Kruger was; but the curious thing is that the policy thus attributed to him is precisely the policy that we ourselves pursue when our primary motive is the good of the natives. Again I turn to Basutoland, and again I quote Mr. Bryce (p. 336):—

> Neither are any mines worked. European prospectors are not permitted to come in and search for minerals. . . . Thus it remains doubtful whether either gold or silver or diamonds exist in "payable quantities."

No one proposes that we should hold the Transvaal primarily for the benefit of the natives, or that we should stop mining; and I suppose no one will imagine that Mr. Kruger was actuated by a disinterested concern for the native in his policy. But the fact remains that to all appearances there was a coincidence in this matter between the policy adopted by Mr. Kruger for his own purposes and the interests of the natives. When some further prospecting was proposed in the Transvaal, Mr. Kruger exclaimed, in words of warning, "Stop and think. . . . For all you know, there may be another Witwatersrand at your very feet"; and Mr. Bryce mentions amongst the dangers that still threaten Basutoland the fact that "many white adventurers would like to prospect for mines."

Conclusion.

Seeing then that we have every reason to regard the mining industry as a curse rather than a blessing to the natives, I take it that our attitude should be one of extreme vigilance, nay, of pronounced suspicion, towards any proposals about native legislation which are advocated in the commercial interests of the miners, and of unqualified scepticism as to any references to "the dignity of labour" that accompany them. Let us take counsel with such Colonial statesmen as Mr. Schreiner and Mr. Merriman, such tried and understanding friends of the natives, outside the official world, as Mr. and Mrs. Cronwright Schreiner, and such patient students of all questions that concern our relations with natives as Mr. Fox Bourne. Let us realise that the moving force in our relations with the natives in the Transvaal is not the good of the natives but the commercial interest of the miners, and that commercial self-interest, though in no sense discreditable, and though the mainspring of industrial enterprise everywhere, perpetually overrides the interests of individuals and classes and disregards the claims of mercy and humanity unless held in check; else why the Factory Acts? The power of this country has placed a number of white men in a position of command over a number of black men. The conscience of this country must watch jealously over the interests of the latter.

I am aware that these are but trite generalities, and that the difficulty lies in their application. Yet I fear I have no more definite contribution to make "towards the formation of sound public opinion" on the native question in South Africa. The sense of the terrible responsibility we incur in this matter by the annexation of the Transvaal, and of our helpless inability adequately to meet it, is one of the many considerations which make some of us regard the issue of the late war as a national disaster, quite apart from our conviction that its inception was a national crime. But surely it will be a bitter disappointment if those who proclaimed a crusade on behalf of the natives have nothing better to offer us now than moral apologies for schemes avowedly propounded to increase European dividends at the cost of enforced African labour, or can only urge a blind confidence in the wisdom and benevolence of that English statesmanship which for a century has made South Africa the "grave of reputations" and its history amongst the most melancholy studies in which an Englishman can engage.

Once more I appeal specifically to Mr. Hugh Price Hughes and Mr. Llewellyn Davies to tell us what they think of the Capitation Tax.

Sept. 23.

PROFESSOR HUXLEY AS A SCIENTIFIC AND PHILOSOPHIC THINKER.*

II.

EARLY in his career Huxley received a letter from his friend Hooker, conveying a piece of advice, which, though we may be glad it was not acted upon, suggests, at least, certain considerations in regard to those products of his intellectual industry, that made the greatest stir in the non-scientific world. "Do take the counsel," it ran, "of a quiet looker-on and withdraw to your books and studies in pure Natural History; let modes of thought alone. You may make a very good naturalist, or a very good metaphysician, but you have neither time nor place for both." Huxley himself laments the necessity he is under of "becoming more and more absorbed in one kind of work," and there is no doubt that he was intensely interested in "the general principles underlying the facts of science." But philosophy, in the proper sense of the word, is the severest and most exacting of disciplines; it demands for the really successful handling of its problems a training at least as strenuous and thorough as that demanded of the serious student of the physical sciences. Huxley came to it with no such equipment, and it was not to be expected that in the small intervals of leisure, snatched from the occupations of an excessively busy life, he could ever make up for that deficiency. Professor Sidgwick speaks, indeed, of his rare power, in philosophical debate, of seeing at once the weak points in a chain of argument; but most of his published essays upon philosophical subjects give one the impression of having been written rather for purposes of propaganda than as careful attempts at reasoned out expositions. Anyone who compares, for example, his Memoir on the Medusæ with his monograph on Hume cannot fail to be struck with the total difference in the method of treatment adopted in the two cases. As a scientific man he was strong and great, and stood in the very first rank of original thinkers; as a philosopher he cannot be said to have dived deeply into metaphysical speculation nor to have appreciated the labours of those who had.† In this article an endeavour will be made to examine his general standpoint in the light furnished by the volumes under review.

Meaning of term "Agnosticism."

To the prfoanum vulgus Huxley is chiefly known as the exponent and defender of the doctrine to which he himself gave the name of "Agnosticism." It is a slippery term, and even its author's own use of it is beset with fatal laxity and contradiction. In a well-known passage, quoted with approval both by Mr. Chalmers Mitchell and by Mr. Clodd, in their lately published sketches of his life and work, Huxley explains that the essence of Agnosticism lies in the rigorous application of a single principle, which is the fundamental axiom of modern science.

Positively, the principle may be expressed: In matters of the intellect, follow your reason as far as it will take you, without regard to any other consideration. And negatively: In matters of the intellect do not pretend that conclusions are certain which are not demonstrated or demonstrable.

It is not easy to see either how the word can denote what it is here said to do, or, if it could, that there was the slightest need for its introduction. For, it has often been pointed out, the principle referred to is none other than the principle of intellectual integrity, and so far from being peculiar to one class of thinkers, has been and is a canon universally recognised by honestly minded men. The true signification, therefore, must be sought elsewhere, and it is to be found in the well-known piece of autobiographical information, which Mr. Leonard Huxley has included in the Life.

When I reached intellectual maturity, and began to ask myself whether I was an atheist, a theist, or a pantheist, a materialist or an idealist, a Christian or a freethinker, I found that the more I learned and reflected, the less ready was the answer. The one thing on which most of these good people were agreed was the one thing in which I differed from them. They were quite sure they had attained a certain "gnosis"—had more or less successfully solved the problem of existence; while I was quite sure that I had not, and had a pretty strong conviction that the problem was insoluble. So I took thought, and invented what I conceived to be the appropriate title of "agnostic." It came into my head as suggestively antithetic to the "gnostic" of Church history, who professed to know so much about the very things of which I was ignorant.

It appears, then, that the term we are considering was coined to express the state of scepticism as regards certain specific and clearly defined matters, and from this, and other passages in Huxley's writings, there is little difficulty in deciding what these matters are. Collectively, they are comprehended under the phrase, "the problem of existence"; individually, they may be specified as the problems which have to do with the ultimate character and essence of reality, the nature of the universe as a whole, of matter and spirit, of the soul and its destiny, of the being or the non-being of God. Now, these are the themes that are admittedly the subject-matter of Metaphysics, so that Professor Huxley's mission, as a philosopher, was to maintain the impossibility of philosophy, and to exhibit the utter barrenness of the field it was usually supposed to occupy.

Why adopt Agnosticism in Philosophy and not in Science.

The first question that naturally occurs when the case is stated thus is—Why should just these particular conceptions be singled out and placed under this quite peculiar ban? For, it will be observed, the whole point of the contention is, not that investigation directed upon the problems mentioned has hitherto proved unsuccessful and that the solution is still unknown—that, so far from being a motive for desisting, would be, on the contrary, a motive for further effort, and is, in fact, precisely the motive which gives rise to research of any kind; but that investigation is, from the very necessity of the case, futile, because we may assure ourselves, before setting out upon it, that we are engaging upon the perfectly hopeless task of trying to know what is unknowable, to solve what is insoluble. But one thing, at any rate, is certain: the impulse that leads men to the quest, the incentive that urges them, is at least as universal, at least as inbred in the very fibre of human intelligence, as the impulse or incentive that animates the search for scientific truth. Does it not seem, on the face of it, a curious freak on the part of Natural Selection to have gone on, through countless generations, preserving and strengthening an intellectual activity doomed from the outset to utter sterility, and making not for the welfare but for the corruption of man? And on what grounds can it be alleged that in this respect the objects of scientific merit a different treatment from the objects of philosophical pursuit? On Huxley's own showing absolute certainty is as unattainable in the one department as in the other; "only one absolute certainty," he tells a correspondent, "is possible to man—namely, that at any given moment the feeling which he has exists," and that, being presumably a mental fact, would in so far stand to the credit of philosophy. Science, as we have seen, is for Huxley a body of rational conceptions, of more or less probable hypotheses, which intelligence carries with it to the interpretation of natural phenomena. But if reason may be trusted to find a way of adapting herself to this, comparatively speaking, alien material, on what pretext can we distrust her power of adaptation to ideas and ideals, which are so to speak of one substance with herself, flesh of her flesh, and bone of her bone? That she should be so utterly unreliable at home seems scarcely promising for her capability and resourcefulness abroad. Huxley would, no doubt, have answered that the proof of the pudding is in the eating; that the truths of science are verifiable by experience, whereas the supposed truths of philosophy are not. That depends, however, entirely upon what you mean by verification. The Law of Gravitation is not verifiable in the sense that it can ever be directly perceived as a natural fact; it is only verifiable in the sense that phenomena behave as we should expect them to behave on the assumption of its truth. It would certainly be no light undertaking to disprove the assertion that verification of a similar kind and of equal cogency can be found for the hypothesis, let us say, of an infinite Mind as the source of the world's order and intelligibility, and if anyone had insisted that he was content to hold this belief on exactly the same tenure as Professor Huxley held his belief in the law of causation—namely, on account of its great practical value and high degree of probability, he would have been acting strictly in accordance with the logic prescribed for scientific inquiry. At all events, there is no salvation from the errors of reason, except by its larger and fuller exercise, any more than there is escape from the mistakes of science except by a more rigorous application of scientific method, and to bid us fold our wings and acknowledge our ignorance is wholly on a par with the advice not to enter the water before you can swim. The fact is, Huxley's attack on Metaphysics only wore a semblance of plausibility through his initial confusion between absolute knowledge and knowledge of the Absolute. To admit that finite thought never attains ultimate reality is one thing; to maintain that such thought always misses it is quite another. If the process of knowing is one that is continually progressing towards a final goal, then that goal is never completely lost sight of even in the poorest knowledge. Our knowledge of the Absolute may be miserably defective; it does not in the least follow that it will not be reliable so far as it goes.

The Dogmatism of the Agnostic Position.

In truth, no claim to absolute knowledge can be more dogmatic than that which presumes to point out the things that knowledge cannot know. The first duty of a consistent Agnosticism, if Agnosticism could be consistent, would be to apply its principles to itself. To deserve its name, the Unknowable should keep out of knowledge, even to the extent of revealing the fact that it is outside. But, somehow, it always contrives to give to its adherents an astonishing amount of information about itself. "After all," asks Professor Huxley, in triumph, "what do we know of this terrible 'matter,' except as a name for the unknown and hypothetical cause of states of our own consciousness? And what do we know of 'spirit,' except that it also is a name for an unknown and hypothetical cause, or condition, of states of consciousness?" Well, if we know that much, we are certainly in no bad way, and may be pardoned for objecting to be counted as ignoramuses. We know then, at least, that these "unknowables" exist, that they are causes, producing by their interaction the world of experience as we are aware of it; though, how they manage to deliver up this account of themselves is one of the "insoluble problems" Professor Huxley did not solve. The above sentences of his are, to use Mr. Bradley's illustration, much as though he had said:—"Since all my faculties are totally confined to my garden, I cannot tell if the roses next door are in bloom." From the Life and Letters might be cited numerous instances of a similar inconsistency. "I have the firmest belief," he writes to Kingsley, "that the Divine Government (if we may use such a phrase to express the sum of the 'customs of matter') is wholly just. The absolute justice of the system of things is as clear to me as any scientific fact. The gravitation of sin to sorrow is as certain as that of the earth to the sun, and more so." How could Professor Huxley be an Agnostic if he could be positive of as much as that? If what is here said be true, a very large part of the insoluble "problem of existence" would be already solved, and a part of it too that most of all has seemed doubtful to the generality of thinkers.

Agnosticism does not make for Free Thought.

Lord Hobhouse rightly insists upon Huxley's splendid services in the fight for intellectual liberty, and there can be little question that, in his advocacy of Agnosticism, he conceived himself to be furthering the cause he had at heart. Yet, it is curious to observe, how directly contrary the result has been from what he would have anticipated. So far from making for free thought, in the better sense of the word, the Agnostic movement has taken the very opposite direction. It is always a suicidal thing for a rationalist to cast discredit upon the powers of reason, for, in the long run, the full stigma of that discredit is bound to fall upon himself. "If you elect to abide by reason, you must put up with its shortcomings, and not expect from it testimony it cannot give," was the burden of Huxley's agnostic message. "Very well, then," has been the reply in a multitude of cases, "we take you at your word; we acknowledge, with you, the impotence of the unaided reason in the presence of matters about which we, as men, are most in need of guidance. If reason cannot supply us with a satisfactory theory of life, how can you blame us for accepting what we require from other hands. You have told us there can be no logical ground for denying the possibility of the miraculous; we bow, then, to a miraculous revelation, which has at least weighty authority on its side, and the contents of which a faculty limited to the finite has as little right to criticise as it has to support." And so, the net result of the agnostic argument has been to strengthen the position of the very orthodoxy it was designed to overthrow, which is now ingeniously wielding the weapons manufactured for it.

The Materialistic Side of Huxley's Teaching.

There is, moreover, another side of Huxley's teaching, coming to the front several times in his correspondence, that would serve as a good defence for the step I have just depicted. On numerous occasions, Huxley repudiated, in "the most unadorned of plain language," what he called the "grenadiers" of the materialistic creed. "The materialistic position that there is nothing in the world but matter, force, and necessity, is," he declared, "as utterly devoid of justification as the most baseless of theological dogmas." "If I am obliged to choose between absolute materialism and absolute idealism," he said again on another occasion, "I should feel compelled to accept the latter alternative," and the choice, he explained, would be on the ground that "our one certainty is the existence of the mental world, and that the existence of Kraft and Stoff falls into the rank of a highly probable hypothesis." Indeed, he goes to the extent of asserting that he is utterly incapable of conceiving the existence of matter, if there be no mind in which to picture that existence. But, whatever comfort we might otherwise have derived from these confessions evaporates into thin air in the light of further considerations. The "mind" spoken of in the above reference we soon learn is no continuous, identical, unifying "self," which, if it be a fact, is one of which we are utterly ignorant, but "a series of perceptions," a succession of mental states, "the symbols in consciousness of the changes which take place automatically in the organism." And although in one passage it is left an open question whether or no consciousness can exist, save in the relation of effect to certain organic molecules as causes, in countless others it is insisted that consciousness, so far as we are familiar with it, is always a function of matter, and that the facts of consciousness are "practically interpretable only by the methods and the formulæ of physics." The progress of science "has, in all ages, meant, and now, more than ever means," we are informed, "the extension of the province of what we call matter and causation, and the concomitant gradual banishment from all regions of human thought of what we call spirit and spontaneity." In short, the materialism which had been unceremoniously expelled through the front door is subsequently politely invited in through the back. States of consciousness resolve themselves after all into mere reduplications of material states; if not themselves forms of physical force they are at least its "concomitants," its "collateral products," its "effects," pictures or symbols of what we call material events, upon which they are absolutely dependent. But what does it avail to be told that mind is not actually itself matter in motion if we must admit that it is as much bound up with such motion as the shadows on the sundial are bound up with the waves of light cast by the sun? If we are obliged to think of mind only in terms of matter, if, on the pain of sinking into "nothing but obscurity and confusion of ideas," we are compelled to interpret mental facts by materialistic formulæ, and to recognise that "matter" is "co-extensive with knowledge, with feeling, and with action," where do the advantages of our idealism come in? Of what concern to us is it to be reminded of what we do not know, if we do know that in our experience mechanical causation is everywhere supreme, and that we ourselves are automata, conscious it may be, but "none the less parts of the great series of causes and effects, which, in unbroken continuity, composes that which is, and has been, and shall be—the sum of existence?" The practical consequences of the doctrine are precisely the same as those of the "systematic materialism" previously rejected, and if these "may paralyse the energies and destroy the beauty of a life," it is hardly surprising that, as an alternative to paralysis and destruction, the Orthodox system of Faith has come to have for men an attractiveness otherwise foreign to it.

His Ethical Precepts inconsistent therewith.

It is true, Huxley himself, in the latter years of his life, when "there were not many apples left upon the old tree," presented to the world, as "the product of the last shaking," a theory of practical conduct which countenances no such dread. The argument of the celebrated "Romanes Lecture" of 1893 will be fresh in the minds of many. It was aimed to prove that the process of evolution in nature furnished no clue as to what ought to be the moral object of man. The law of the Cosmic process was self-assertion and struggle; the law of the ethical process was sympathy and mutual helpfulness. The end of the Cosmic process was the survival of the fittest; the end of the ethical process was the fitting of as many as possible. "The practice of that which is ethically best—what we call goodness or virtue—involves a course of conduct which, in all respects, is opposed to that which leads to success in the cosmic struggle." "The cosmic process has no sort of relation to moral ends; the imitation of it by man is inconsistent with the first principles of ethics;" man's progress depends, "not on imitating the cosmic process but in combating it." And the dwarf, in virtue of his intelligence, can bend the Titan to his will. No one can fail to admire the elevated moral tone that pervades the lecture, nor the fine stoical spirit that will not surrender the ethical ought in the unequal struggle with the cosmic forces. But here we can only ask whether such an attitude is at all consistent with the philosophy we have been considering. And the answer cannot be doubtful. According to that philosophy, man, as we have seen, is as purely a part of the great series of causes and effects which constitutes the cosmic process as the humblest weed; his intelligence and will are composed of conscious states that are immediately produced by molecular changes of the brain-substance, and we have "no proof that any state of consciousness is the cause of change in the motion of the matter of the organism." How, then, is opposition to the cosmic process on his part either possible or conceivable? As a conscious automaton he is nature's product, nature's slave; civilisation, the "artificial" contrivances of humanity are all of them outcomes, not of man's reason or volition, but of the vast mechanical system, of which his reason and volition are the "expression," and, whatever they may be, his reason and volition have had no more to do with their production than with the production of earthquakes and volcanoes. If, then, he finds himself converted into an instrument for "checking the cosmic process at every step," it can only be because the cosmic process has suddenly taken an unaccountable dislike to its own procedure.

Microcosm and Macrocosm.

But, even if we allow to human thought and intelligence a power of operating, altogether precluded on Huxley's premisses, still it would be impossible to pit the "microcosmic atom" against the "illimitable macrocosm" in the way contemplated. No man can fight with any heart for goodness and virtue, if he feel all the while that he has the full weight of the vast physical universe against him and that in the end all his labour will be in vain. If the root principle of nature be exemplified by the method of the ape and the tiger, no devices of human intelligence and will would be able to influence or modify a world that could stand to them in no such relation as that of environment. Man would be as helpless as a prisoner in his cell to humanise his surroundings, and the impulse to do so would be speedily suppressed, after a few fruitless attempts to dash his spirit against stone walls. Only if the laws and conditions of righteousness be really implicated in the working processes of nature, and a moral being be not "ein trüber Gast" upon the earth, but an organ in furthering its innermost purpose, has the ethical life so much as a basis upon which to rest. Throughout his "Romanes Lecture," Huxley paints the cosmic process in the darkest colours; he speaks of the "unfathomable injustice of the nature of things," and of the revolt of the human conscience against "the moral indifference of nature." But that had not always been his opinion. Years before he had, as we have seen, expressed his firmest belief in "the absolute justice of the system of things," and in his famous description of human life as something like a game of chess between man and a hidden player, he had pictured the latter as "always fair, just and patient," as "a calm, strong angel who is playing for love and would rather lose than win." At the same time he could see "no shadow or tittle of evidence that the great unknown stands to us in the relation of a Father," although, if the doctrine of Providence meant "the strong conviction that the cosmic process is rational and the faith that, throughout all duration, unbroken order has reigned in the universe," he not only accepted the doctrine, but was disposed to think it the most important of all truths.

Final Attitude.

Violently irreconcilable as these statements are, they have an interest of a wider sort than that of merely logical consistency. The contradiction indicates that, in the higher experiences of life, Huxley was perpetually striving to justify an idealism, which in lower moods seemed to fade away. He who had "graduated in all the faculties of human relationships; who had taken his share in all the deep joys and deeper anxieties which cling about them; who had felt the burden of young lives entrusted to his care, and had stood alone with his dead before the abyss of the Eternal";—it had not been his lot "never to have had a thought beyond negative criticism." In his earlier years, he had not "cared whether his poor personality" would continue to exist or no, but he felt a "dislike to the thought of extinction increasing as he got older and nearer the goal." And then, in seasons of "utter sincerity, when he had bared his soul before the immensities and the eternities," the old trust in the love and justice of the principle that rules the world would return, and he departed hence, a firm believer in the worth and value of life, whatever the future might have in store.

Be not afraid, ye waiting hearts that weep;
For still He giveth His beloved sleep,
And if an endless sleep He wills, so best.

Resignation, then, was the final word he had to utter, but it came not as from a baffled thinker; rather was it associated with the yearning of a pilgrim for his ideal home—tendentemque manus ripæ ulterioris amore.

G. Dawes Hicks.

The Sunday School Association.—The late Mr. I. M. Wade.—At a meeting of the Committee, held on Friday, Oct. 3, at Essex Hall, the following resolution, proposed by the President, Rev. James Harwood, B.A., was passed:—

The Committee of the Sunday School Association, meeting for the first time since the death of Mr. I. M. Wade, desire to place on record their sincere regret at the loss of one whom they valued so highly. Among the many interests to which Mr. Wade was devoted probably none lay nearer to his heart than that of our Sunday schools. With this Association especially his name will always be closely identified. For upwards of forty-five years he held office as its hon. secretary, president and vice-president, and during the whole of that long period was unwearying in his endeavours to promote its interests. The Committee, in assuring Mrs. Wade and Mr. Harold Wade of their deepest sympathy, trust it may be some solace to them in their sorrow to think of the quickening and uplifting influence exercised by the strenuous life just closed on earth.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

For the last few weeks we have been thinking of Whittier and some of his poems. There are others about which I may tell you some other time, but now we must say good-bye to him for the present. And in doing so, and remembering his brave and patient life, which was ended ten years ago, so faithful and unselfish and rich in quiet happiness, let us recall the beautiful trust he had in the goodness of God and His unchanging love.

In the same year in which Whittier wrote "Snow-bound" with the picture of his old home, he wrote those beautiful verses on "The Eternal Goodness," some of which are all the more touching, when we remember how much had been taken from him.

I long for household voices gone,
For vanished smiles I long,
But God hath led my dear ones on,
And He can do no wrong.

I know not what the future hath
Of marvel or surprise,
Assured alone that life and death
His mercy underlies.

. . . . .

And so beside the Silent Sea
I wait the muffled oar;
No harm from Him can come to me
On ocean or on shore.

I know not where His islands lift
Their fronded palms in air;
I only know I cannot drift
Beyond His love and care.

Twenty-one years later, when he was much nearer to the peaceful ending of his own life, he wrote these other verses. You will, perhaps, find them difficult, but they are worth thinking about. They show how the old man was strong in his faith to the last, and how we may learn the same great lesson, that in Goodness and Love God is always with us.

I pray for faith, I long to trust;
I listen with my heart, and hear
A Voice without a sound: "Be just,
Be true, be merciful, revere
The Word within thee: God is near!

"A light to sky and earth unknown
Pales all their lights: a mightier force
Than theirs the powers of Nature own,
And, to its goal as at its source,
His Spirit moves the Universe.

"Believe and trust. Through stars and suns,
Through life and death, through soul and sense,
His wise, paternal purpose runs;
The darkness of His providence
Is star-lit with benign intents."

O joy supreme! I know the Voice,
Like none beside, on earth or sea;
Yea, more, O soul of mine, rejoice,
By all that He requires of me,
I know what God Himself must be.

No picture to my aid I call,
I shape no image in my prayer;
I only know in Him is all
Of life, light, beauty, everywhere,
Eternal Goodness here and there!

I know He is, and what He is,
Whose one great purpose is the good
Of all. I rest my soul on His Immortal Love and Fatherhood;
And trust Him, as His children should.

I fear no more. The clouded face
Of Nature smiles; through all her things
Of time and space and sense I trace
The moving of the Spirit's wings,
And hear the song of hope she sings.

LONDON, OCTOBER 11, 1902.

STIR THE FIRES!

SUCH meetings as those held this week at Newcastle-on-Tyne are good for inspiration and the re-kindling of zeal for strenuous and devoted service of a great cause. Would that thousands instead of hundreds could have been present on Sunday in the Church of the Divine Unity, to be quickened by the spirit of those services to a new joy in the fellowship of the deeper life,

> Each glad soul its free course winging,
> Each glad voice its free song singing, and to hear the heart-searching appeal of the President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, who was the preacher, for loyalty to high ideals and a truer appreciation of the value of our free fellowship in religion. Mr. ARMSTRONG'S evening sermon, on "Five Conversions to Unitarianism," is published, and we trust that its closing appeal to members of our Free Churches will be heard far and wide and will be taken to heart.

No mere acceptance of Unitarian doctrine and profession of liberal sentiments can satisfy the claims of urgent duty made by our Churches upon those who inherit their privileges, and made by the great world of men and women in the country and the city on all who have a human heart, and begin to understand what is meant by brotherhood and trust in the Eternal Goodness.

We who are Unitarians have a testimony to bear and a work to do in the world, and only in the doing of it can our faith truly be established. We may be very ready with words concerning our faith, but it is deeds that tell. No deep impression will be made by the most skilful theological controversy, if there is not manifestly at the back of it the power of a helpful life, that grapples with the present needs and evils of the world, and a spirit of devotion that is felt to be a quickening and uplifting force in the united worship of the Church.

Two of the speeches at Newcastle that went most directly home touched upon these two essential needs, if we are to be found faithful in our day and generation. Mr. TARRANT spoke at the public meeting of the needs of the city. There is the severest test of the sincerity and power of our religion, although the principle is the same throughout our life, in the country village, and in every highway, no less than in the most neglected and desolate quarter of the city. We believe, we say, in the Divine Fatherhood, in the purpose of good, which rules throughout the universe, and in a true human brotherhood. Then here, close at home, what is the measure of our faithfulness? How do our Churches reach out helpful hands? How far do our men and women, happy in their pleasant homes, rich in culture and beautiful gifts of life—how far do they go down into the dark places of the city, determined to understand, to spend and be spent in grappling with the evil, to stand in unaffected sympathy side by side with the worn and poverty-stricken, with the victims of oppression and sin? Where there is the true spirit of self-sacrifice, in patient and cheerful giving for our brethren's sake, there faith is justified, and the Divine Compassion and Love truly understood.

And that spirit must come out of the heart of our Churches, if they are indeed alive, quickened to the true life with GOD. Where that spirit is manifest, men and women will believe and attend to their word, and rejoice more and more in the brotherly fellowship they offer.

For ourselves, finding its field of practical service in the world, that spirit will be most surely nurtured in the habitual worship of the Church, whence comes the central inspiration of our life. That was the truth urged in a most helpful speech at the Conference by Mr. JOHN GRAHAM, of Glasgow. Whatever good intellectual work Unitarians may have done in the past as rational theologians, we must now realise, he said, that so far as we can render any vital service to the world, it is because we have passed from the religion of the letter or merely of the understanding, to the religion of experience. The mass of the people will only attend to the utterance that appeals directly to moral experience. There we must look for demonstration of the spirit and of power, for there in surrender to duty, in loyalty to high aims, in the self-surrender of conscience, we are nearest to GOD, and the all-conquering power of His Spirit lives in us. This is realised in the hour of worship, where we may rejoice in contemplation of the beauty of holiness and in the strength of Eternal Righteousness, in the Church, which is the true fellowship of faithful men.

We must look then for a new outpouring of the Spirit, but in the simple ways of daily duty, and in the brotherly union of the hour of prayer, in heart-felt loyalty and self-surrender. Thus alone can new power arise in our community, and our word appeal with a divine persuasion to the world.

These are thoughts which it is well to ponder as we set ourselves to the winter's work, and we are thankful that they were pressed upon our attention amid the happy fellowship of this week's autumnal meetings. Let the word run swiftly, for encouragement and counsel, that at every post of duty there may be a new alertness and steadfast courage, and renewed dedication to quiet service.

AUTUMNAL MEETINGS AT NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION—NORTHUMBERLAND AND DURHAM UNITARIAN CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION—SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

THE Autumnal Meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association were held this week at Newcastle-on-Tyne, on the joint invitation of the Church of the Divine Unity and the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Christian Association, in connection with the annual meeting of that Association, while, as at Leeds last year, a meeting of the Sunday School Association was also held.

NORTHUMBERLAND AND DURHAM UNITARIAN CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

The annual sermons of this Association were preached on Sunday in the Church of the Divine Unity by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, of Liverpool, President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. There were large congregations, the church in the evening being well filled, and the collections for the funds of the Association amounted to £17. At the morning service, "O Rest in the Lord" was beautifully rendered, and in the evening, Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer."

The morning sermon, from Joel ii. 28, 29, was an eloquent vindication of ideal vision, if anything really great was to be accomplished in life. It was a great mistake, the preacher said, to suppose that the great dreamer could not be also the great man of affairs, and he instanced Cecil Rhodes, who, whatever their judgment of his character and work might be, was undoubtedly a man of great dreams, but also a mighty handler of men, and accomplisher of definite purposes. So Columbus had his vision, and Cromwell, the most mystical of English statesmen, yet a ruler with the heaviest fist, and a man of indomitable will. The great need of modern life, with its incessant pressure of routine and material activity, was to secure quiet times of the spirit in which ideals could come to their birth. They must long for a new outpouring of the Spirit, that should rekindle this ideal, and for this the fundamental need was that their young people should get convictions, not mere prejudices or opinions, but clearly thought out and luminous convictions, based on principles of truth and right. The growth of tolerance in modern times was an admirable thing, but it must not mean to them that one opinion was as good as another, and it was really no matter. They must pray for strenuous men with convictions, and vital germinal principles, to make a true unity of life. Then they would be strong for faithful service, to make the world other than it was. To enter the service of some pure ideal would give the true nobility to life.

The evening sermon, from Ephes. vi. 14, "Stand therefore, having girded your loins with truth," was on "Five Conversions to Unitarianism," recounting the experience of the five ministers—Anglican, Congregational, Wesleyan, Presbyterian, and Roman Catholic—who told last Whitsuntide how and why they became Unitarians, and drawing lessons from their experience for the members of our Free Churches. The sermon is published as the October number of Mr. Armstrong's "Sermons for the Day."

In the afternoon a united service was held in the church for the Sunday-school, together with the Byker and Gateshead schools, and attended by a number of other friends. The service was conducted by Miss Marian Pritchard, who gave an address, which was greatly appreciated by the children and their elders, on the old German saying, "Be glad and do good."

THE BUSINESS MEETING.

The annual business meeting of the District Association was held on Monday afternoon in the Church of the Divine Unity, the President, Alderman J. BAXTER ELLIS, J.P., in the chair.

The PRESIDENT, who was supported on the platform by the Revs. R. A. Armstrong and W. Copeland Bowie, President and Secretary of the B. and F.U.A., Mr. G. G. Laidler, and Messrs. F. C. Slater, E. H. Coysh, secretaries of the Association, and J. Duncan Donald, acting financial secretary, offered a very cordial welcome to the President and other representatives of the National Association, and bore testimony to the invaluable help received in the North from that Association. Their churches, in spite of slow progress and small numbers, had been influential in the past, and their work was by no means done. The work in their province was being steadily carried on, and they looked forward with confidence to the future.

The report of the Committee was then read by Mr. F. C. Slater, and the financial statement by Mr. J. Duncan Donald.

The Report gave satisfactory particulars of the work of the churches, stating that all the churches of the District now had settled ministers except Barnard Castle and Darlington, and noted a valuable course of four doctrinal lectures given by the Revs. F. Walters, W. H. Lambelle, C. Travers, and A. Harvie, at Choppington, South Shields, Sunderland, and Gateshead, and another course by Mr. Walters in his own church, and also the great interest aroused by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter's lectures on "The Gospel in the Nineteenth Century" at Newcastle. The accounts showed grants amounting to £155 from the B. and F.U.A.; subscriptions, £88 17s.; and a balance of £4 18s. 2d. in hand on a total of £309 1s. 5d.

On the motion of the PRESIDENT the report and accounts were adopted, after which the Rev. W. H. LAMBELLE moved and the Rev. C. TRAVERS seconded a vote of thanks to the President, officers, and Committee, and on the motion of Mrs. JOHN TWEEDY, the President was re-elected. Further resolutions were passed re-appointing the officers and Committee, warm thanks were tendered to the Rev. R. A. Armstrong for his sermons on the previous day, and a welcome was tendered to Mr. and Miss Pritchard and the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, all of whom briefly responded.

On the motion of Miss ALICE LUCAS, seconded by the Rev. C. TRAVERS, the following resolution was passed:—

"That this meeting protests against the Education Bill now before Parliament, because it proposes to give State aid to sectarian purposes, it invades the rights of conscience and violates the principle of religious liberty; and further, that a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the Prime Minister, the Leader of the Opposition, and the local members of Parliament.

A resolution of thanks to the chair, moved by the Rev. F. H. VAUGHAN, of Hull, to whom the President had also offered a welcome, brought the business to a close, after which further addresses were given by the Rev. H. V. Mills, President of the North Lancashire and Westmoreland Unitarian Association, and others, the Rev. FRANK WALTERS adding, on behalf of his congregation, a cordial welcome to the visitors.

A reception to the representatives of the B. and F.U.A., and the S.S.A. and other visitors was subsequently held in the school-room by the Rev. Frank and Mrs. Walters, and was largely attended.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

PUBLIC MEETING.

On Monday evening a public meeting was held in the Lovaine Hall, Alderman J. Baxter Ellis, J.P., in the chair, supported on the platform by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong (President), Miss Marian Pritchard, Revs. J. Harwood and W. G. Tarrant, Messrs. W. Long, J.P., I. S. Lister, Ion Pritchard, and W. Copeland Bowie (Sec.), the deputation of the B. and F.U.A., Mrs. John Tweedy, the Revs. Frank Walters, E. Ceredig Jones, W. R. Shanks, H. V. Mills, J. Forrest, J. A. Pearson, C. Travers, and J. J. Wright, Messrs. R. Affleck, J.P., O. Levin, Jas. Graham, W. Stewart, F. C. Slater, and E. H. Coysh. Other ministers and leading laymen of the district were in the body of the hall, the floor of which was well filled.

After the singing of "Come, Kingdom of our God," the CHAIRMAN proposed and Mr. G. G. LAIDLER seconded a resolution of hearty welcome to the President and other members of the B. and F.U.A. deputation, and called upon the President to speak.

The Rev. R. A. ARMSTRONG, having acknowledged the welcome, said that was a gathering of the members of two kindred Associations, kindred in their object and modes of work. They had three great ideals, (i) the liberation of the human mind from every kind of undue interference with the processes of thought and the aspiration of religion, (ii) the extension and universal recognition of the principle of absolute veracity in religious matters, binding on all, cleric and lay, orthodox and heterodox alike, and (iii) the high and pure type of religious faith which had acquired in the course of history the name of Unitarianism, but had never allowed the name to bind it down to any exactly definable set of dogmas, but always overruled any dogmatic tendency by the spirit of the perfect freedom which was the first ideal of their Association.

It was a truism to say that they lived in a time of the breaking up of old dogmatic systems. The old doctrine of eternal punishment had disappeared from the minds of all thoughtful and enlightened men. The doctrine of the Trinity had undergone strange disintegration. It was still defended by a large number of clerics in most ingenious ways, but no two of them meant exactly the same, and none of them meant the orthodox doctrine of the Trinity as originally defined. From the lay world, as a matter of realised belief, the Trinity had absolutely disappeared. Then there was a certain vague and undefined doctrine as to the nature, the person and office of Christ, something vibrating between the conception of the human and the deified Christ. But for his own part, he believed they would never get the full inspiration of Christ's wonderful life and word until they frankly recognised that he was purely human as they themselves were. But along with that extraordinary revolution in dogmatic belief there had grown up a widespread indifferentism. The vast masses of the middle classes were absorbed in business or recreation, or both, and religion, as an element to occupy time and energy, was squeezed out between the two. What a field, then, there was for them who had a faith which frankly approached the secular life without any reproach to it, as an element natural and divinely ordained, but to be permeated by the religious spirit, with a sense deep down in the heart of the presence of God, the holiness of the world, and their calling to live as sons and daughters of God. There was much to encourage them in the world around in the progress of liberal thought, but holding as he did that veracity was of more worth even than Unitarianism, he could not think it a subject for congratulation that Unitarianism was preached where the service and the minister by his profession were pledged to a contrary doctrine. The supposed advance was rotten to the core unless along with it went the spirit of veracity, as it had been illustrated by those five ministers who had recently come into their ranks, of whom he had spoken on the previous evening.

In conclusion, he spoke of the education conflict, and, in the first instance, condemned the Bill because it had been brought in in a manner altogether unjustifiable. It was a revolutionary measure, making sweeping alterations in the conditions of the life of the people, and it ought to be laid before the constituencies before it was dealt with in Parliament. There had been no whisper of such a measure at the last General Election. The School Board system was indeed young; but it had grown into the fibre of the people, and to sweep away that system would be a revolutionary measure. Even if they approved of the measure, they ought as constitutional politicians to insist that it should be laid before the electors before the matter was finally decided. But as to the character of the measure, it was inspired by a little group of highly ecclesiastically-minded laymen; it was the Bill which these laymen and the Bishops and Convocation thought the strongest which it was possible on their lines to obtain. A Bill with such an origin he approached in a mood of suspicion. It abolished School Boards, and the people's direct control of the people's schools, placing them in the hands of a co-opted body, chosen by an elected body, and that body chosen for totally different purposes. It displaced women from the place they had so nobly won for themselves in the education of England. It abolished evening schools, and cut down education in the schools of the people to the age of 15. That was done in the name of the secondary education, for which no real provision was made. It sapped the whole principle of democracy, and extended that sacerdotal influence which many of them dreaded with an unsleeping dread. It increased the tendency to sectarianise the schools. The time for compromise was past. To the Compromise of 1870 the Nonconformists had been faithful, but by the denominationalists it had been persistently violated. There were two absolutely antagonistic ideals of education, and he believed now in a fight to a finish. The challenge had been given and the field was clear. They must not rest until the battle was won for freedom, for the children and for their country.

Miss Marian Pritchard then gave an address on "What Unitarianism Means to Me." She had no fault, she said, to find with the name, though she refused to be bound by any definition of it. Did not Unitarian suggest unity, unity of spirit in diversity of operations, in the family of God, with the command to do good everywhere? To her, Unitarianism meant two great root-principles: First, that at the heart of the Universe is love and wisdom and truth and righteousness, and that the Great Spirit, whom we call God, and symbolise as the Heavenly Father, is the embodiment of these. The world, therefore, is going upwards, not downwards, since God is Power and Love. In each one of us is the germ of divine reason, and it is not only our right, but our duty and privilege to use that reason, to think for ourselves, and thus to see what best approaches our ideal, and give it voice in our lives. Such faith was simple, indeed, but it was not easy; yet from every sorrow and trial they might wrest its blessing; and remembering the Patience of God, whilst fighting with all their might against evil which they could subdue, they must learn to be patient with that which was beyond their reach and turn to do what was in their power bravely and well. And secondly, they must not only use for themselves the divine wisdom, but accord the same freedom to others. Unitarianism was based on those two principles and would take in all who believed that the Power ruling the world was good, and that the world was going upward, and that each one could do his best. So they could take to their brotherhood the Mohammedan and Christian, and all religious bodies, and, might she not say, the reverent Agnostic. They must have freedom, and therefore she was glad to belong to their Free Churches, and to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, because it allowed to every individual that feeedom which was demanded by their faith.

The Rev. Frank Walters spoke on "Have we a Mission?" and answered Yes, because they had profound convictions. The truths for which they stood were to them the bread and water of life, nourishing their own souls, and therefore they dared not withhold them from others. There was much truth in the saying that Unitarianism was only another name for freedom, and they did well to thank God for their freedom from the dangers of priestcraft and the chains of dogma. Deliverance from slavery must come first, even though the land of promise seemed far away. Yet they were chiefly thankful for freedom because of the magnificent results attained. They might have feared that such freedom would lead to anarchy; but the fact remained that in consequence of their freedom Unitarians were more vitally united in their convictions of truth than any other Church in Christendom. The Catholic Church boasted of being a united Church, but it could only maintain its unity by excommunicating those who ventured to think for themselves. The Anglican Church was united, but like one of those "happy families" in which creatures of different sorts used to be exhibited in a cage together. It was a curious collection of different sects which would fly asunder as soon as the legal bond was severed. And so the Wesleyan Church was united, but only by a vigorous use of the theological muzzle. He was not criticising those Churches, but simply stating historical fact. Their unity was artificial, not vital and organic; but for themselves, the freest of the free, believing in private judgment to the uttermost, unity was vital. They were rightly called Unite-arians. They had no ecclesiastical authority to compel conformity or fetter progress; they were candidates for truth and truth alone. Having found truth in their freedom, they must share it with others. They were free, but they were more than free, they were Christians, Rationalists and Unitarians, because reason and conscience gave them the result of faith in one God, the Father. Thus their religious mission was to affirm and expand their Unitarian faith, a faith simple and beautiful, which led them into the profoundest truth. If anyone would give them something better than Unitarianism they would make it theirs. Meanwhile, they were convinced that was what the world needed. They must maintain the charter of their spiritual emancipation, and announce their solemn belief in the Fatherhood of God and the final redemption of man in a perfected Brotherhood. For that they would continue to toil and strive.

The Rev. E. Ceredig Jones spoke on "Our Churches Regarded as Religious Homes," and made an earnest plea for a deeper sense of the value of united worship and the duty of members of the church to their religious home. In Wales the covenant between minister and congregation was felt to be binding on both sides, that so long as the minister did his duty the people were bound to support him by their means and their presence. In their English churches there were too many absentee members, "more buttresses than pillars" in the church, and that ought not to be. He told of the great loyalty of the Unitarians in Hungary to their churches, and how in Toroszko the whole population of the village (all but one, who was a Jew), numbering 2,000, were Unitarians, and regularly attended the daily morning service in their church. The walls of the church, as Jokai said in his "Manasseh," were bare, but the church was rendered beautiful by its people. Such loyalty should be theirs as well.

The Rev. W. G. Tarrant spoke of "The Problem of the City," and urged their duty to realise the responsibility laid upon them by the darker side of city life, its miseries and oppressions and sin. The city was not all evil, or there would be no problem, for so it could not continue to exist; but when they looked upon the people of the city they must realise that each one was a child of God, and they must make their religion not a thing of definitions, but of life, and show what was meant by the Unity of God incarnate in His creatures. It must be a unity instinct with the spirit of their Master and of the Father. It was not only the evil men did that they deplored, but the good they might do, and left undone. In facing the problem of the city, sanitation and education were good, but what he urged most strongly of all was that they must get hold of the young people, the growing youths and girls, and help them into the right way.

The Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, who was announced to speak on "The Crisis in National Education," then moved:

That this meeting is of opinion that the efforts of all lovers of justice and of all friends of education must now be directed to the establishment of the principle that representation shall go hand in hand with taxation, and that no grant of national or local funds shall be made to any school a majority at least of whose managing body does not consist of representatives elected by the district for the purpose; and urges everyone present to bring pressure to bear upon M.P.'s in their respective localities to secure the reconstruction, or, failing that, the withdrawal of the Education Bill.

In drafting that resolution, he said, he had been glad to adopt for its declaration of principle the words of Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, in a speech made in 1877. Nothing had happened since then to alter their view of the principle so admirably stated. Where the State asked the people to find money, public management must follow. That was an acknowledged principle in English politics, and to maintain it they should concentrate effort and attention, and they must insist on freedom for the teacher. They had abolished tests at the Universities, because tests resulted in a huge system of hypocrisy and oppression; but now there were thousands of teachers in the schools suffering from that oppression. In any Education Bill that was to satisfy the people, there must be popular control and the teachers must be free from every form of theological test. The Training Colleges also must be free, if supported by the State. Though he had been for twelve years a member of the greatest School Board in the country, and knew the splendid work the Boards had done, yet he should be prepared to surrender the name, if he could be assured that in the new measure the municipalities would really have the management and control of the schools. The essential thing was to secure proper control. If people had only cared enough for a large and generous education they might have had universal School Boards throughout the country. But they had not got them, not because the country was sacerdotal, but because it did not realise the supreme need of education. They must strive for a more effective system, but if the control was put into the hands of the denominationalists there would be no chance. He was disposed to try for a reconstruction of the Bill, so that the nation should undertake the whole responsibility for education and should pay for it, and insist on public management.

The resolution was seconded in the first instance by Mr. R. Affleck, who, however, said that he should have done it with greater pleasure, if there had been no mention of reconstruction, and when Mr. Robert Elliott moved and the Rev. C. Travers seconded an amendment to omit the clause about reconstruction, he withdrew from the seconding, which was taken up by Mr. William Long, of Warrington. After some discussion the amendment was lost, and the original resolution carried by 53 votes to 30. The meeting then terminated.

THE CONFERENCE.

On Tuesday morning the Conference of the B. and F.U.A. was held in the Church of the Divine Unity, preceded by a devotional service conducted by the Rev. John Ellis. The President having taken the chair, a paper was read by the Rev. Robert Drummond, of Edinburgh, on "Theology as affected by the results of Biblical Criticism," and after speeches by the Revs. H. Rawlings, W. G. Tarrant, and the President, another paper was read by the Rev. J. C. Pollard, of Lancaster, on "What the laity might make of their Churches," which was also followed by discussion, in which Mr. W. Long, Mrs. J. Tweedy, Mr. J. Graham (Glasgow), Miss Lucas, Mr. Ion Pritchard, and the Rev. W. G. Tarrant took part. These papers and any further notes on the Conference we must reserve for future publication.

At the conclusion of the Conference, the President of the Northumberland and Durham Association, Alderman J. Baxter Ellis, entertained a large company of friends to luncheon at the Grand Assembly Rooms, Barras Bridge, when the loyal toasts were duly honoured, and also that of the two Associations, to which their Presidents, the Revs. R. A. Armstrong and J. Harwood, responded. This was followed by "The President," proposed by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, with warm acknowledgment of his generous hospitality.

Sunday School Association Conference.

In the afternoon a Conference of the Sunday School Association was held in the Church, the President, the Rev. James Harwood, in the chair.

In his opening address the President paid a tribute to the memory of the late Mr. I. M. Wade, who for so many years had been enthusiastically devoted to Sunday School work.

Mr. Ion Pritchard, hon. secretary, made a statement as to the work of the Association, followed by a helpful interchange of opinion and experience by various workers, the question of lantern slides and the value of the black-board being brought into special prominence. The following five papers were then read, of which we hope later to give some further account:—"The Sunday School as a Social Force," by Mr. J. S. Mackie, of Burnley; "A Missing Link in Our Sunday School Literature," by the Rev. Frank Walters; "Temperance Teaching in the Sunday School," by Miss Clara C. Lucas; "Our Traditions in relation to our Sunday Scholars," by the Rev. Ottwell Binns, of Scarborough; and "The Duty of the Church to the Sunday School," by Mr. Charles Slater, of Newcastle. At this Conference the Manchester District Sunday School Association was represented by the Revs. W. R. Shanks and W. Holmshaw.

THE CONVERSAZIONE.

On Tuesday evening the series of most successful meetings was concluded by a conversazione at the Grand Assembly Rooms, Barras Bridge, at which the guests were received by Alderman and Mrs. J. Baxter Ellis, and Mr. and Mrs. Otto Levin (Mr. Levin being secretary of the congregation of the Church of the Divine Unity). Close upon 500 persons were present, and a delightful evening was spent.

The arrangements for the meetings throughout were most admirably made, and the gratitude due to the hon. local secretaries, Messrs. F. C. Slater and E. H. Coysh, was acknowledged in the course of the day by an enthusiastic vote of thanks. Many guests will have the pleasantest recollection of Newcastle hospitality.

PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY OF LANCASHIRE AND CHESHIRE.

THE EDUCATION BILL CONDEMNED.

A special meeting of the Assembly was held in the Memorial Hall, Manchester, on Tuesday, for the purpose of considering the Education Bill. The President, Mr. F. Monks, of Warrington, was in the chair.

The roll having been called by the Rev. R. T. Herford, he read a letter from the Rev. H. E. Dowson, expressing his regret for absence, and protesting against the Bill on grounds similar to those stated in the resolution of the Assembly; also a letter from Mr. Harry Rawson, who was in favour of Municipal Councils as the authority rather than the School Board, and further letters from Messrs. W. B. Bowring, R. D. Holt, &c., condemning the Bill.

On the motion of the Rev. S. A. Steinthal, the following resolution, slightly amended from the form originally proposed, was carried almost unanimously:—

That this Assembly is of opinion that the Education Bill, now before Parliament, is a measure conceived in the interests of sectarianism, and destructive of any truly national system of Education in its re-endowment of Voluntary Schools, and its abolition of School Boards.

That, by securing the entire maintenance of Voluntary Schools by the rates and taxes, apart from that of maintaining the buildings, while giving to the Voluntary Managers a two-thirds majority on the School Committees, it is a flagrant breach of the accepted principle that the ratepayer should control the expenditure of the rates.

That clerical control, which this Bill will largely increase, as has ever been the case, will have a blighting influence on Education, the true culture of the children being sacrificed to the aim of making the Schools nurseries of the Churches; while to do this at the cost of ratepayers whose consciences are thereby aggrieved is a wrong that will be bitterly resented.

That the abolition of School Boards directly elected by the people will diminish their interest in Education; the new Education Authorities, largely nominated and co-opted bodies, being in little direct touch with the ratepayers.

That women will no longer be placed by election on the Education Authorities; one of the best influences on Education being thus weakened if not lost.

That the teaching profession will be closed more largely than ever to all but members of the National Church; and that no satisfactory provision is made for the training of teachers in Unsectarian Colleges.

That the Bill, as a measure of Secondary Education, is utterly inadequate, and neglects to meet this the most pressing Educational need.

That the Bill, in effect, is a disastrous Educational measure, and if passed into law will not only inflict grave wrong upon a large portion of the community, but will tend to destroy much that is best, and to give new life to much that is worst, in the Education of the people.

That all true friends of National Education should unite in the effort to defeat the Bill.

An amendment moved by the Rev. E. W. Lummis and seconded by the Rev. C. T. Poynting, condemning the Bill simply for educational inefficiency, and calling for amendments in those respects, was previously lost, and the following further resolution, moved by the Rev. W. C. Hall and seconded by Mr. E. C. Harding, was subsequently carried almost unanimously:—

This Assembly is further of opinion that no Education Bill will be final or satisfactory in its operation which does not provide (1) that public funds shall go to the support of secular instruction only, and (2) that theological instruction shall not be recognised as coming within the functions of the State.

The twenty-fourth annual report of the Social and Political Education League states that the past season was one of the most successful in recent years. The total number of lectures delivered was 203 as against 163 in the previous year, and 210 in 1899-1900. The attendance, for the most part, was well up to the average, and in an increasing number of cases the lectures were followed by questions and discussion. Reference is made to the honours conferred by the King on the retiring president, Sir Alfred Lyall, and on two of his predecessors, Sir Leslie Stephen and Mr. Lecky, and to the deaths of two vice-presidents of the League, Dr. Rawson Gardiner and Lord Acton. The new president is the Hon. Joseph H. Choate, D.C.L., LL.D., the American Ambassador. All lectures are given gratuitously, though societies and clubs are expected to contribute towards the expenses according to their means. Copies of the lecture list may be obtained from the Organising Secretary, Mr. A. H. Reed, 23, Old-square, Lincoln's Inn, London, W.C.

The Essex Hall Hymnal Revised.—We noted a few weeks ago a mistake in this Hymnal, by which a hymn of James Freeman Clarke's (No. 57) is attributed to Margaret Fuller. A misprint in Hymn 327 has also been pointed out, where in the second line plenitude should be read. If any further misprints or mistakes have been discovered, we should be glad to hear of them at once, that they may be noted for correction.

WELCOME to the new Hibbert Journal! Its first number comes to us with a tasteful cover, a substantial Quarterly of over 200 pages, of which the articles occupying the larger half of the volume are printed in that sumptuous type which we have learned to enjoy in the Monthly Review. The last seventy pages, occupied with reviews of books, are in smaller type. The editors are to be congratulated on their first number, which amply fulfils the promise of their undertaking to offer a genuinely open field to religious thought. If they had provided only the last seventy pages of reviews, they would have made a contribution of great value to the discussion of vital questions of Religion, Theology and Philosophy, to which the Hibbert Journal is devoted. Thus Professor Henry Jones contributes an elaborate notice of Royce's Gifford Lectures, "The World and the Individual." Professor Muirhead subjects Kidd's "Principles of Western Civilisation" to searching criticism, Professor Peake and Dr. James Moffatt write on the Old and New Testament portions respectively of the "Encyclopædia Biblica," Dr. Rashdall writes on Fairbairn's "Philosophy of the Christian Religion," and Professor Percy Gardner on William James's "Varieties of Religious Experience." Among the slighter notices are Professor Sanday's of Dr. Drummond's Essex Hall Lecture, and Mr. Carpenter's of Moffatt's "Historical New Testament." Schmiedel's article on "Ministry" in the "Encyclopædia Biblica" is the subject of separate criticism by Dr. T. M. Lindsay, Professor Upton deals with Höffding's "Religionsphilosophie," and Professor W. B. Smith, of New Orleans, asks serious consideration for Van Manen's treatment of the early Christian literature. Professor Ritchie adds a brief notice of Muirhead's "Philosophy and Life," and finally Dr. Hicks, the Sub-Editor, contributes notes on the most important contents of "Recent Theological and Philosophical Periodicals," a piece of work the labour and value of which are not to be judged by the space into which it is condensed.

Turning now to the substantive articles of the Review, we find a great variety of interest, and perhaps we ought not to complain that in a first number more than one article touching upon great questions of religion and life leaves us unsatisfied and asking for more. Thus Sir Oliver Lodge seeks to define "The Outstanding Controversy between Science and Faith," but does little towards answering the question he proposes; and Professor Howison, of the University of California, who contributes the first of three papers on "Catastrophes and the Moral Order," suggested by the recent terrible disasters of Martinique and St. Vincent, appears to us to take a strangely superficial view of the subject. The further contributions on this subject from the Rev. R. A. Armstrong and Dr. R. F. Horton touch the deeper issues in a much more helpful manner. On the side of mental rather than moral philosophy is Professor Royce's article on "The Concept of the Infinite," which we commend to those who enjoy trying to do mind-puzzles.

In the department of theological and biblical study we have the first part of a valuable article by Dr. Drummond, "On the Meaning of 'Righteousness of God' in the Theology of St. Paul," and a contribution by Mr. F. C. Conybeare on "Three Early Doctrinal Modifications of the Text of the Gospels," in which very cogent evidence from old versions and commentators is brought to show how the texts, Matthew i. 16, xxviii. 19, and xix. 17 (this last, as parallel to Mark x. 18 and Luke xviii. 19) have been modified in the interest of orthodoxy. As to the famous baptismal formula (the great remaining Trinitarian text, after the final departure of the Three Heavenly Witnesses) it is shown how Eusebius before the Council of Nicea, in at least eighteen citations of Matthew xxviii. 19, read "in my name" and not the familiar triple phrase; and Mr. Conybeare adduces other evidence to prove that "in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost" was a late orthodox modification of the text. Thus Westcott and Hort's contention that the text of the Gospels bears no trace of having been altered for dogmatic reasons is no longer tenable, and Mr. Conybeare is confident that a more careful editing of the Fathers would bring to light many more original readings of the text, of which the watchful guardians of orthodoxy had been careful to obliterate the traces before the date of our earliest remaining Greek MSS. Mr. Stopford Brooke's article on "Matthew Arnold—a Poet of Fifty Years Ago" deals chiefly with Arnold's first volume of poems of 1849, but also traces the failure of his poetic fire and the reasons which led him to turn to prose. Arnold and Clough, Mr. Brooke calls "the Hamlets among the modern poets," yet with a difference, for Arnold had more moral strength than Hamlet. "He had this strength because he clasped Stoicism, which Hamlet could not do, to his breast." And further, it will be seen that Mr. Brooke finds more than Stoicism in Arnold.

The place of honour is given to an article by Professor Percy Gardner on "The Basis of Christian Doctrine." Its standpoint may be gathered from the following sentences, which occur early in the article, where Professor Gardner is examining a definition of Christian Doctrine by Dr. Westcott as "at any time the present intellectual appreciation of certain actual events":—

> The history contained in the Gospels is certainly largely mixed with mythology. A permanent basis for doctrine can only be found in historic facts the evidence for which is beyond question, the realities of the permanent life of the spirit. . . . The first and most fundamental point in all reformulation of doctrine seems to be that it must take its start less from historic record, and less from metaphysical principle, than from experience. . . . Nothing, indeed, endures, as possible foundation for doctrinal construction, save observation and experience.

Doctrine, therefore, must be studied in the light of the facts of human nature, and it is divided into three sections: the doctrine of God, or Theology proper; the doctrine of Christ, or Christology; the doctrine of man, or Soteriology. The second of these is left for treatment "perhaps in another paper."

To the third, that of Soteriology, Dr. Gardner gives the place of pre-eminence in modern thought, but when he defines "the great and essential realities" which lie at the root of all such doctrine of man, putting in the first place "a natural sense of sin," it appears to us that only a very partial view is taken of the moral experience of man, and that the whole subject needs further elucidation apart from the special forms of doctrine that have prevailed in the Church.

It is with the greatest satisfaction that we welcome this first number of the Hibbert Journal. The Review promises amply to fill the blank left by the recent discontinuance of the New World, and we are happy to have once more in this country a Review which may revive and add new lustre to a high tradition of liberal religious thought and scholarship established long ago by the Prospective and the old National Review; and we will venture to add one word of pleading. Such a Review can only live and prosper, as we must hope it will, by the abundant support of many readers and subscribers. Let it be distinctly understood that good wishes and sympathy must take that practical form, if this work, for the great cause of Truth, is to be adequately sustained.

WOMEN AND EDUCATION.

SIR,—In our opinion it would be wrong for women to acquiesce without protest in the adoption by Parliament of the Education Bill. For, amongst all the great issues that are involved, there is one as to which there is no uncertainty, and that is the effect of the Bill in crippling and virtually almost preventing the co-operation of women in the organisation and administration of Education. For it is not possible that the Bill should be so amended as not to have this effect. It is of the essence of the Bill that it provides that county and borough councils shall be local education authorities. To these councils women are not eligible, and although there is much need that they should be rendered eligible, Parliament will not deal with that question as a side issue in an Education Bill. Hence, if the Education Bill passes, not a single woman can be a member of those Education Authorities. And what will be the position of women on the Education Committees to be appointed by these authorities under the schemes made locally? It has been truly set forth that:—

(I.) Women will have no share in making the local schemes.

(II.) The appointing bodies will consist of men only.

(III.) The appointing bodies will have no special qualifications with respect to education, and will therefore be less likely to realise the need for the adequate co-operation of women.

(IV.) The committees appointed by the least enlightened of the councils will be those on which the services of women of independent mind and experience will be most needed; and yet it will be precisely those councils that will be the least likely to appoint such women.

(V.) Of the 110 bodies in England that are to be the appointing bodies, only fifteen have, so far, appointed women to serve on their Technical Instruction Committees.

We ask whether it is well that the education of girls and infants, to say nothing of that of boys, should be entrusted to men alone as the ultimate authority? Whether a different provision is not due to the body of women teachers who form two-thirds of the staff in elementary schools? Also whether it is just to women generally to place new obstacles in the way of their serving (if individually competent) as administrators in education? And whether the electorate are wise if they allow their freedom of choice of servants to be curtailed?

A DISCLAIMER.

SIR,—Will you allow me to emphatically contradict the statement in your last issue that I had INVITED Dr. Griffiths, the Unitarian minister of Ilkeston, to preach for me in the Congregational Church at Grange? The fact is that Sept. 21 was one of my holiday Sundays, the arrangements for which were made by the church secretary. Hence I disclaim all responsibility.

I trust to your courtesy to give this contradiction the same prominence you gave to the original statement.

[We are sorry to have been misinformed as to Mr. Berry's action, and still more sorry that it was not true.—ED. INQ.]

HUXLEY AND EVOLUTION.

SIR,—I am indebted to Mr. St. Clair for his kind reference to my article, published in your issue of the 27th ult. His criticism, however, upon one paragraph therein is based upon a misunderstanding, which, I am sure, he will acknowledge when it is pointed out. It is quite true that in 1876, after examining the fossil remains of the ancestors of the horse, collected from the tertiary deposits of the Far West by Professor Marsh, Huxley expressed the opinion that we had demonstrative evidence of evolution. But, in the paragraph in question, I did not say that doubt as to the fact of evolution, but doubt as to the Darwinian hypothesis—a mode, namely, of accounting for evolution—remained his to the last. And of this there can be no question. From the first he insisted that our acceptance of that hypothesis "must be provisional so long as one link in the chain of evidence is wanting; and, so long as all the animals and plants certainly produced by selective breeding from a common stock are fertile with one another, that link will be wanting; for, so long selective breeding will not be proved to be competent to do all that is required of it to produce natural species." And, writing to a correspondent in 1891, four years before his death, Huxley says:—"I insisted on the necessity of obtaining experimental proof of the possibility of obtaining virtually infertile breeds from a common stock in 1860. Mr. Tegetmeier made a number of experiments with pigeons some years ago, but could obtain not the least approximation to infertility. From the first I told Darwin this was the weak point of his case from the point of view of scientific logic. But, in this matter, we are just where we were thirty years ago."—(Life, Vol. ii., p. 291.) In the light of this testimony it will be admitted that my statement was strictly accurate.

G. DAWES HICKS.

London, Oct. 6.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

LONDON.

LET me begin with a hint or two that are too important to be buried a column deep. First, will friends out of London please make a point of commending to a minister in London persons known to be newly settling here? If in doubt as to the nearest church, send the name and address to the secretaries, London District Unitarian Society, Essex Hall, or to me. Secondly, will visitors to our services, especially those from other towns, kindly introduce themselves to the minister? Thirdly, will those who see room for improvement in our worship and work lend a hand to improve them?

So much by way of general entreaty. As to retrospect and prospect much might be chronicled, and with the strictest regard to brevity I must try to mention many things. Changes are going on rapidly in the ranks of our London ministers. Shortly we are to have the Rev. H. Gow at Rosslyn-hill, Hampstead, and all who heard his sermon at the Association anniversary confidently expect much from his ministry. Londoners need hardly be reminded that Mr. Gow is no stranger at Hampstead, but it is specially noteworthy that for some years he toiled at the foundations of Domestic Mission work at Mansford-street, Bethnal-green. By a happy coincidence, this mission church depends chiefly on the support of the Hampstead congregation, whose new minister will assuredly do all that is possible in the way of bringing the slums into vital connection with the suburbs.

The Rev. John Ellis, whose appeal for workers appeared in last week's INQUIRER, has now well begun his ministry at Mansford-street. If the person who is reading this paragraph will earnestly consider whether he (or she) can help and must, or not, a practical response to that appeal will surely be forthcoming. If the reader wants a place of good work that is easy to reach from everywhere, where the surroundings are ever fresh and fair, and the human creatures one meets are all delightful—well, believe me, there is no such place in London. But there are half-a-dozen places on our list that have very much the opposite of these features, and so much the more therefore they need help. I will mention some urgent cases—there are degrees of inaccessibility and repulsiveness, and whosoever will may take his choice. There is Deptford, piteously in need; Stamford-street—does the reader realise what that street is? Children and young people are growing up there—think of it! Then there are our Domestic Missions at George's-row, Rhyl-street, and Lisson-grove. Ex uno disce omnes. I met a stranger, not "one of us," the other evening. Speaking of the minister of one of these he said, "Why, do you know that his place is occupied every day, at all hours, in all sorts of things!" I did know—at least, the substance was true. Can a man, even a minister, manage all that himself? Rather not. Again, there is Bermondsey, now starting on somewhat a new line with a brave young minister, the Rev. Eustace Thompson, leading. Brave, yes; but he must not be left all but single-handed at his work. Who will go, there or elsewhere?

Another newcomer who is making a great effort is the Rev. George Critchley, at Clarence-road, Kentish Town. The London District Unitarian Society, confident in his zeal and ability, are making a very generous guarantee in order to keep this church alive. The building is a large one and badly needs mural cleansing. If any lover of beauty will send the minister financial help towards this work he may be sure it will be well spent. Mr. Critchley mentioned a new idea regarding Sunday-schools at the Whit-week meeting, and I am glad to hear he has had an encouraging start in trying to put his idea into practice. Probably the editor will get him to report progress on this special topic some day. We need the ferment of fresh thoughts like his.

There is to be an autumnal meeting of the London District Unitarian Society at Essex Hall on the 28th inst., when Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence (president), the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, Mr. W. Blake Odgers, and other well-known speakers will give addresses. But undoubtedly the feature of the occasion will be the introduction of the Rev. J. H. Wicksteed to the Society as its new lecturer and district minister. Already Mr. Wicksteed has been heard amongst us, and the conviction grows that a better appointment would be impossible to make. Young and ardent, yet with an experience rich in many ways, the new lecturer comes to a great work amid great expectations. May he, too, be well sustained, not only in the inner sources of strength, but by the manifest sympathy and assistance of all who wish well to the cause of liberal Christianity. It would be a good beginning if a great rally of friends were made on the occasion of this meeting.

Kilburn has done splendidly thus far in steadily working towards independence. I hear the members are grappling heroically with difficulties due to subsidence in the soil, and are even scheming out a move towards the erection of the church for which the site was long ago acquired. At Lewisham, also, earnest thought and deed are manifest in dealing with the difficulties inherent in being tenants of a defective building instead of owning a better. I hope both schemes will be well launched ere long. At Highgate a new hall is required, and being required it will be raised. That seems the appropriate way of referring to this zealous congregation and its minister, the Rev. R. H. Greaves. At Wood Green the members, having erected a beautiful building, are doing all they can to furnish it well with worshippers. In their love for the venerable pastor, Dr. Mummery, there is a perennial fount of life. At the opposite side of the suburban circle is Wandsworth, hoping shortly to hold a festival meeting in honour of the twenty-first anniversary of the first service held in the neighbourhood.

So the chronicle runs on—and might run on still. But the sum of it all is that, so far as I see, there is honest effort everywhere. We could do more if we did better; but I believe many are doing at least well. It is harvest festival season; we pray the Lord of the Harvest that he send forth more labourers into his harvest. W. G. TARRANT.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Harvest Thanksgiving Services.

Pressure on our space obliges us to condense this week's reports of Harvest services and group them together. Abundant decorations, special music, and large congregations may be taken for granted in every case:—

Ballyhemlin.—Preacher, the Rev. Charles Thrift.

Cullompton (combined with Sunday-school anniversary).—Preacher, the Rev. Jeffrey Worthington. Visitors who came by cycle were present from Exeter, Taunton, and Tiverton. The lessons were read by two of these laymen. At the afternoon service Mr. Harold Goodland, of Tiverton, gave the address.

Cwmbach: S. Wales (Sunday and Monday).—Ministers, the Revs. W. James, H. Fisher Short, J. H. Davies, and D. Evans.

Gateshead (Sept. 28).—Preacher, the Rev. W. H. Lambelle, of Middlesbrough. On the following Monday a fruit banquet and first social gathering of the season took place.

Horsham.—Preacher, the Rev. J. J. Marten. Afternoon, address to the children by Mr. Tarring.

Knutsford (Sept. 28).—Combined with Sunday-school anniversary.—Preacher, the Rev. E. S. Hicks, of Bolton. Collections, with donations, £14 6s. 7d. At Allostock Chapel, on Oct. 5, the Rev. G. A. Payne preached the annual sermon for the thirteenth time. Collection, £2 13s.

London: Peckham.—Preachers: Morning, the Rev. Eustace Thompson. Evening, the Rev. G. Carter. Afternoon, address to the children by Mr. A. H. Biggs.

London: Stratford.—Preacher, Mr. T. Elliot, of Highgate. On the previous Wednesday the opening meeting of the Young People's Guild was held, and addressed by the Revs. T. E. M. Edwards and W. H. Rose. On Monday evening the Temperance Guild and Band of Hope held their eighth annual tea-meeting, when addresses were given by the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards and Messrs. A. W. Harris and W. J. Noel.

Manchester: Longsight.—Preacher, the Rev. H. J. Rossington.

Newark.—Preacher, the Rev. E. R. Hodges.

Oxford: Church of the Divine Love.—Preacher the Rev. Vernon Herford.

Selby.—Preacher, the Rev. John Fox, of Hunslet. Followed on Tuesday by a successful tea-meeting.

Taunton.—Preacher, the Rev. Dr. Warschauer, of Clifton. Collections for the Taunton and Somerset Hospital, £4 14s. 10d.

Wisborough Green.—Preacher, the Rev. G. Lansdown, of Billingshurst. On the previous Thursday a tea-meeting and lantern exhibition by Mr. W. Carter. On Monday the reading-room was opened for the winter session.

Ainsworth.—In our issue of Sept. 20 we repeated from the Times a report as to the great mineral wealth (estimated at £40,000) of some farm land which forms an old endowment for the minister of the Cockey Moor Chapel. The report as to the intentions of the congregation was unauthorised. We now learn from the Bury Times that the Trustees are granting an eighty years' mining lease to the Moss Hall Coal Company, at a minimum annual rental of £250. This, however, cannot be used by the congregation as income, but must go to capital account.

Ashton-under-Lyne.—The fifth anniversary services of the Unitarian Sunday-school were held last Tuesday. The preachers for morning and evening were the Revs. W. C. Hall and C. J. Street, of Bolton. A children's service in the afternoon was conducted by the Rev. W. L. Schroeder, of Sale. There were good attendances in the morning and afternoon. At the evening service the building was comfortably filled. Collections realised £14, to which a few liberal donations have to be added. As on previous occasions, a new hymn, by the Rev. W. C. Hall, was sung at the evening service. One pleasing feature of the day was the attendance of prominent members of the local Nonconformist congregations, who on several occasions have shown practical sympathy with the work here.

Bridport.—Sunday-school anniversary services were held Sunday week, conducted by the Rev. John Ellis, of London, and on the following evening a tea-meeting was held, when reports as to the school and the Band of Hope were presented, and Mr. Ellis gave an address on the formation of a guild. The Rev. H. S. Solly presided.

Huddersfield.—On Sunday week the Rev. W. Mellor preached in the Fitzwilliam-street Church a sermon, which is fully reported in last Saturday's Huddersfield Examiner, dealing with the moral and religious aspects of the refusal to pay sectarian school rates. Such a refusal, he said, could only be justified as the very last resort, after every expedient of constitutional procedure had been tried in vain.

Northampton.—On Thursday evening, Oct. 2, a congregational gathering was held at Kettering-road, at which an address of congratulation on his ninetieth birthday was presented to Mr. W. G. Beeby from the congregation and Mr. Beeby's Temperance friends. He has been an abstainer for seventy years. Mr. John Sale presided at the meeting, and the Rev. T. W. Freckelton was among the speakers.

Rochdale.—The annual Festival of the Blackwater-street Church on Sunday was rendered memorable by the unveiling of three new stained-glass windows, the latest gifts of the members of the Heape family. In accordance with the request of the donors there was no formal ceremony of unveiling and no public reference to their gifts. The windows are the work of Messrs. Morris and Co., from designs by the late Sir Edward Burne-Jones. The chancel window, in its four lights, presents two rows of symbolic figures, Truth, Liberty, Knowledge, and Faith; and below Justice, Prudence, Love, Humility, and it bears the following inscription:—"Erected in 1902 by Robert and Richard Heape in memory of their grandfather, Benjamin Heape, and his work and steadfastness as a member of this church for nearly fifty years. Born 1780, died 1847." Two other windows, in the south aisle, are the gift of Miss Heape replacing two earlier memorial windows placed there by her father. The Rev. T. P. Spedding was the preacher at both services, and in the morning took as his subject, "The Offering of Art to Worship." The collections for the church funds realised over £23.

The South-West Wales Unitarian Association.—The quarterly meetings were held at Capely-bryn, New Court, on Tuesday and Wednesday week. On Tuesday evening a religious service was conducted by the Rev. E. O. Jenkins, and the Revs. D. Evans and W. James, B.A., J.P., were the preachers. On Wednesday morning a council of the members of the Association was held under the presidency of the Rev. T. Lloyd Jones, Liverpool; and at ten o'clock a religious service was conducted by the Rev. D. Evans, and the Rev. D. Rhys, Rhondda, the appointed preacher of the meetings, delivered an able sermon on "Self-Sacrifice," as the principle out of which all that was best in life had proceeded. He pointed out how all the great privileges we enjoy had been bought with the life-blood of past reformers, and ably illustrated the contrast between the real character of Christ's sacrifice and the popular orthodox view of it. In the afternoon a committee of ministers and Sunday-school workers was held, the Rev. D. Evans in the chair. The most important subject for discussion was that of providing the children with a monthly Welsh magazine to bring the Sunday-schools into closer union, and awaken in the young an interest in Unitarian literature. It was ultimately decided to take the necessary number of copies of "Young Days," and add a four-page supplement of Welsh matter, without increasing the price, and a fund was started for the purpose. The afternoon service was conducted by Mr. Simon Jones, B.A. (H.M.C.), the preachers being the Revs. J. Hathren Davies and R. J. Jones, M.A., Aberdare. In the evening there was another religious service, conducted by the Rev. D. Rhys, when sermons were preached by the Revs. J. P. Kane and T. J. Jenkins. Glorious weather, a large attendance, excellent singing, and hospitable entertainment, all contributed to a series of most successful meetings.

Walsall.—A meeting was held on Monday week in the Unitarian Free Church to welcome the Rev. W. F. Turland as minister. Mr. Hodgkins presided, and offered a very cordial welcome to Mr. and Mrs. Turland, in which three local ministers of other denominations, who were present, joined, and the Rev. A. A. Charlesworth, on behalf of the M.C.U., Mr. A. W. Worthington, the Rev. J. C. Street, and others joined. Mr. Turland, in responding, referred with pleasure to the months he had already spent with them, since June, and looked hopefully to the future.

THE LATE MRS. PAGE HOPPS.—Many friends heard last week with heartfelt sympathy of the loss sustained by the Rev. J. Page Hopps in the death of his wife. Counting ourselves among those friends, we willingly publish the following note which we have received from Mr. Hopps:—"I want to thank a great many friends for exceedingly kind letters lately, and to say that I cannot reply to each one. Will you help me to make a general public acknowledgment?"

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Letters, &c., received from the following:—H. R. F. B.; E. C.; E. H. C.; J. E. C.; R. D.; J. T. H.; E. W. L.; W. L.; G. M.; H. J. M.; O. M. R.; F. T.; L. T.; W. V.

[ESTABLISHED 1860.]

Edited by MARIANNE FARNINGHAM.

EVERY FRIDAY, ½d. Monthly Parts, 3d.

In spite of nearly half a century of active, useful life, this vigorous advocate of Sunday-schools shows not a trace of grey hair or baldness. It steps into the twentieth century full of youthful ardour. Under the capable editorship of MARIANNE FARNINGHAM it provides a surprising quantity of valuable reading for up-to-date Sunday-school teachers who wish to be well equipped.

Miss FARNINGHAM does not forget that it is good for the most enthusiastic teacher occasionally to "unbend his bow," and with this end in view a deeply interesting serialised story, complete storyettes, and informative "tit-bits" appear in each issue, in addition to the regular weekly pabula of:

Notes by the Editress. Notes on the Morning Lessons. Two Sets of Notes on the International Lessons—one for Infant-class Teachers and the other by Professor Adeney. And Readings for School and Home.

Many who are not teachers will find pleasure and profit in reading Prof. Adeney's able articles; and the teacher who studies them week by week will receive, easily and almost unconsciously, a very valuable training for the important work that is more than ever important in these progressive days.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL TIMES can be had of any Newsagent in the United Kingdom.

If by post, direct from the Office, the terms are—

Per Quarter, 1/1; per Half Year, 2/2; per Year, 4/4

THE SOUTH SHORE UNITARIAN CHURCH, BLACKPOOL,

has purchased, at a cost of nearly £600, a plot of freehold land, and they now appeal for help to erect a plain, substantial building to serve for all purposes. It is hoped to be able to do this for £1,500, making a total cost of £2,100. The land, thanks to the generosity of Mrs. John Grundy, of Summerseat; Miss S. Scholes Wrigley, of Windermere (on her own and her late mother's behalf), and Mr. R. T. Heape, of Rochdale, is entirely paid for. The Congregation have themselves promised over £300 towards the erection of the building. They carry on the Services and the Sunday School without any grant, and they feel that the remarkable success of their efforts justifies them in asking friends to help them to carry on their work under more favourable circumstances than at present. Their appeal has the full approval of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, the North and East Lancashire Mission, and the North Lancashire and Westmorland Unitarian Association; and the B. and F. U. A. has promised £25 to the Building Fund.

Yorkshire Training School of Physical Culture.

The above School was opened more than two years ago with the object of providing a centre in the North of England for the professional training of educated women in the Swedish system of Physical Culture.

The minimum cost is of two years' duration, and includes the Study of Physiology, Anatomy, Hygiene, Chemistry, Elementary Pathology, Theory of Movements, Practical Subjects, as Gymnastics, Fencing, Swimming, Games, &c.

That such a centre is needed seems to be proved by the fact that the first student trained by this School was, on the completion of her course, appointed under the Bradford Board as Instructress on Physical Culture to their schools.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

WE hope to publish next week a special article by Mr. Stopford Brooke on "The Vision of Christ in Browning."

IT will be seen from an advertisement in another column that to-morrow (Sunday) Mr. Stopford Brooke is to preach not only in the morning at Little Portland-street Chapel, but in the evening at Unity Church, Islington. At this service he is to make an appeal on behalf of the North London Nursing Association, an admirable institution which provides trained nurses to attend the sick poor in their homes, and is in serious danger of being crippled in its good work by lack of funds. South Londoners have doubtless discovered how easily they can get to Unity Church for Sunday evening services by the electric rail from Clapham Common direct to the Angel at Islington.

PARLIAMENT reassembled on Thursday, and before these lines are printed will have entered on the battle of the autumn session over the Education Bill. Mr. Balfour and Mr. Chamberlain, in recent speeches, appear to have set their backs to the wall, but we shall see what we shall see.

THE autumnal session has been heralded by a great number of public meetings. The extent of the agitation is indicated by the fact that on Monday alone nearly forty meetings of importance were held, chiefly to discuss the Education Bill. The opponents of this measure have been very active, and their gatherings have been, on the whole, of a much more popular character, as well as more numerous, than those of the supporters of the Government. Among the more noteworthy meetings of the week was that of the Women's Local Government Society at St. James's Hall, London, on Monday, further enforced by that of the Women's Liberal Federation, at the same place, on Wednesday. The exclusion of women from a share in the management of the schools is admitted by the Archbishop of Canterbury to be a "defect"—he says the "only defect"—in the Bill. We do not gather, however, from the speeches of Government representatives that it is to be removed.

MR. BRYCE, in a characteristically clear and forcible speech at Llandudno on Monday, emphasised other, and, pace Dr. Temple, equally salient "defects" of the Bill. It proposes, he said, to > Hand over half the schools of the country in perpetuity to one denomination only, to exclude from the post of teacher in one half of the schools every person who was not a member of the Church of England, to perpetuate the distinction between two classes of schools, differently managed but standing side by side, and to destroy the bodies which in the towns had worked successfully for education, and, indeed, had done nearly all that had been done for it during the last twenty-five years.

Mr. Balfour, on Tuesday night, speaking to a great meeting of supporters in Manchester, alluded to some ludicrous misstatements current as to the scope of the Bill, and had an easy task in refuting them. But it would have been more to the purpose if he had addressed himself to such criticisms as Mr. Bryce's. He had not a word to say, for example, as to the appointment of teachers in the rate-aided denominational schools; and, while he echoed Mr. Chamberlain's phrase about giving to the publicly elected authority "full control over secular education," he omitted to show how, if the clerical majority on the Boards of Management have the power to exclude all but professed members of a special Church from the teaching staff, it will still be true that the Councils have "full control of secular education" in the schools.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN'S Liberal Unionist friends appear to be divisible into three sections—first, those who with him accept the Bill as the best possible under the circumstances; secondly, those who do not consider the sacrifice of long-advocated principles too great in order to secure an Imperialist party in power; and thirdly, those who, with deep regret, decline to accept their leader's lead in this matter. We shall see how many will venture to range themselves against him. As Parliament reassembles, the prospects of any amicable agreement are very remote. Any sign of substantial amendments, such as Mr. Chamberlain seemed, at his Birmingham conference last week, to consider possible, is looked for in vain in Mr. Balfour's speech, the main drift of which showed a remarkable unconsciousness of the sense of irritation abroad. Other Government speakers, the organisers especially, exhibit more sensitiveness to public opinion, and the Government candidate at Devonport has deemed it wise to adopt a conciliatory tone. The contest is being fought principally on the Education Bill, and though it will be keen, the issue is hardly a doubtful one.

ON one point Mr. Balfour does appear to have faintly understood the opposition to the Bill, though he naturally glided from the vulnerable position as quickly as possible. It is argued against the Government that they have brought in their measure without having consulted the constituencies upon it, and that, so far as the bye-elections show, the electorate is decidedly opposed to them. The Prime Minister's reply is substantially that any Government has a "mandate" to do the best it can for the nation, and that here is a matter of vital importance to the people's life. Good; but it is rather unreasonable, in these democratic days, to act upon the general "mandate" referred to against the express wish of the people, so far as it is ascertainable. Complaint is made of the exaggerated language and violent threats of opponents of the measure; but a mind so usually candid as Mr. Balfour's must be able to form a better estimate of the position than to suppose all this heat is artificially generated. Nothing is more probable than that, if the Bill is passed in anything like its present form, very serious opposition to the law will manifest itself. Mr. Balfour says, in effect, let the disaffected change the law rather than break it. The maxim is admirable, but its application depends on circumstances. The House of Lords is a standing difficulty in the path of reform. And, be that as it may, would it not be better to try to avoid the possibility of violent reaction, and to base the law on "the best and surest foundations" of a general national agreement?

THE meeting of the General Committee of the National Liberal Federation at the old Westminster Town Hall on Wednesday was a powerful demonstration against the Education Bill. The resolution, unanimously passed, condemned the Bill as "a retrograde, pernicious, and, as regards women, a disfranchising measure," and declared that in view of the peculiar circumstances of the last General Election and the results of recent bye-elections the Government had no moral right to force the Bill through Parliament. The resolution was moved by Mr. Augustine Birrell, in a forcible and characteristic speech. "What had the great School Boards done," he asked, "that they should be butchered to make a parsons' holiday?" Dr. Clifford, who seconded, declared that there could be now no compromise. There must be no sheathing of the sword until they got a system of national education absolutely free from either ecclesiastical or theological restriction, without clerical interference with the teaching profession, a system of education that was universal, that aimed at character rather than at creed, manhood rather than Churchmanship, and that provided young England with opportunities of taking their true place in the competitive markets of the world and in the leadership of the moral and intelligent life of mankind. Mr. James Bryce also made a forcible speech. The country, he said, was thoroughly roused. This was not a Nonconformist question; it was a lay question—the laity against the clergy. The feeling among enlightened and thoughtful members of the Church of England was as strong if not as ardent as among Nonconformists. The great question now to be decided was whether education was to be clerical or public. They hoped at last to attain to a system of education truly national, which should show no regard to sects, but only to citizens, a system commensurate with their needs and worthy of a great and free people.

Apropos of what the Methodist Times calls the "New Anti-Church Rate Movement," a movement which in that paper meets with unqualified sanction and approval, the editor was reminded by a correspondent of Christ's example "when he preferred to pay the Temple-tax rather than give offence." (Matt. xvii. 24-27.) The analogy is pert, but by no means decisive, and there is a certain vagueness in the language of the evangelist which allows of more than one interpretation. But the Methodist newspaper boldly puts aside any such dubious advantage as might be gained by a critical examination of the narrative itself; and authoritatively answers, "There was nothing in the teaching or ritual of the Temple to which he conscientiously objected. Therefore your application to the Education Bill is erroneous." The matter is settled, but at the price of how many thousands of sermons which have taken for granted the defects of the ordinances of the law!

There was a "record" attendance at the Baptist Union meetings in Birmingham. More than 1,800 delegates' names were received, and of these 1,400 actually knocked at the doors of their hosts. On every hand it was admitted that the magnet which drew this great crowd was the Education question. The Baptist churches have never before been so much in earnest about any public question. Churches too poor in other years to send representatives made sacrifices to pay their delegates' expenses. The amendment of Dr. Glover to the no rate policy aroused a host of fears that somehow the Union might be cajoled into a less determined attitude than that of Dr. Clifford. We cannot say that the debate was entirely worthy of the occasion. Dr. Glover's speech lacked force and point, while, truth to tell, Dr. Clifford went off into fireworks. Nor did the audience behave itself quite seemly. It listened with great impatience and many interruptions to the opponents of the prevailing mood, and gave another sad illustration of the lack of courtesy which so often marks a mob. Taken one by one no member from the vast assembly would have been anything but ashamed to show rudeness to so venerable and distinguished a man as Dr. Glover, but mixed in a crowd individuals forgot their manners and lost their self-control. The fact is such meetings do not come together to debate and deliberate, but to emphasise a decision already arrived at.

Certainly the voting was remarkable. Out of 1,500 present only 21 voted for the amendment. Whether one approves or disapproves of the no rate policy the volume of passion with which the resolution was carried is significant of much. There can be no mistake that so far as the Baptists are concerned the heather is on fire. The Education question dominated the whole session. It could not be kept out of the missionary meetings; it was the absorbing theme of a very remarkable people's meeting for the exposition of Free Church principles in the Town Hall; it roused the young people's meeting to enthusiasm. Old ministers declare that never in the history of the Union has one question so filled and stirred any of its conferences.

The Tercentenary of the Bodleian Library at Oxford was celebrated on Wednesday and Thursday of last week, and was honoured by the presence of a large number of distinguished representatives of foreign Universities and great libraries in this country and abroad. On Wednesday evening the Vice-Chancellor's reception was brilliant by reason of many gorgeous doctors' robes, and on Thursday there was a presentation of honorary degrees in the Sheldonian and a banquet in Christ Church Hall. Before Thomas Bodley's day an upper floor had been built to the Divinity School, to receive the gift of six hundred MSS. from Duke Humphrey of Gloucester, but only the shell of this nucleus of a library remained after Edward VI.'s reforming commission had made their onslaught on papistical literature, and Bodley was the veritable founder of the great library, with which his vanity insisted that his name should be connected.

Thomas Bodley was one of James I.'s many knights. A Devonian by birth, he received his early education abroad during the Marian persecution, but completed his studies at Magdalen College, Oxford. He travelled, and went to Court, married a rich widow and became a successful diplomatist, but disappointed of further promotion, towards the close of Elizabeth's reign, wisely determined to possess his soul in peace for the residue of his days, and "to set up my staff at the Library door in Oxon." With much practical ability and persistence, with money and influence in high quarters, he set himself to his task, and on Nov. 8, 1602, the renovated library was opened. Next year he was knighted, and in the following year was enrolled "The Library of the Foundation of Thos. Bodley, Knight." Many valuable possessions were secured for the library during Bodley's life-time (he died in 1613), and not least among them the covenant with the Stationers' Company, which secured the right to receive a copy of every book published in the kingdom. These and other points of the story are told in an interesting article on the library in the September Nineteenth Century and After.

St. Deiniol's Library, at Hawarden, built as part of the national memorial to Mr. Gladstone, was opened on Tuesday afternoon by Earl Spencer. Some further notes on this interesting foundation we must reserve for next week.

The Rev. Joseph Armitage Robinson, D.D., formerly Norrisian Professor of Divinity at Cambridge, and since 1899 Canon of Westminster, has been appointed Dean of Westminster in succession to Dr. Bradley, recently resigned. The new Dean, who is only in his fiftieth year, is a distinguished scholar, and has edited a collation of the Athos Codex of the "Shepherd of Hermas" and other early Christian literature, and is also an acceptable preacher. He does not represent any extreme party in the Church. The successor to his canonry is the Rev. H. C. Beeching, chaplain of Lincoln's Inn and Professor of Pastoral Theology in King's College. Mr. Beeching, who is now well known for his studies in English literature, began his ministry as curate at Mossley Hill, Liverpool.

At the Peterborough Diocesan Conference a question was discussed which concerns all ministers of religion as much, or nearly so, as the established clergy. This was the need of training in the administration of relief. All ministers are called upon to act, officially or privately, as almoners and trustees of funds contributed for distribution in alms. All are subject to appeals, made personally or through the post, which they have but little time to sift, and which are dealt with, as a rule, rather by impulse or instinct than by any settled rule. The resolution adopted by the Conference may be commended to our own college authorities:—

That it is desirable that candidates for holy orders should be required to give a certain amount of study to economic subjects, and satisfy the examining chaplains on this head.

The October number of Sermons for the Day (Liverpool Booksellers' Co.) contains the sermon on "Five Conversions to Unitarianism," preached by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong on Sunday week at Newcastle in connection with the annual meeting of the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Christian Association. Loyalty to Truth is the burden of the sermon, which recounts the experience of the five ministers who told last Whitsuntide how from different branches of the Church they came out into the freedom of Unitarianism. We have been too much accustomed, the preacher said, in our practice if not our profession, to think lightly of membership in our churches, but the experience of those five men has a very different lesson for us.

Here from every quarter of the Christian world come footsore pilgrims who have wrenched themselves with agony away from their ancient altars, and cry, "Ah, here at last is the pearl of great price; here is the reconciliation between understanding and faith; here is freedom; here is peace! Better to dwell with you, few though you be, to pray and praise with you in perfect freedom, than even the joy of fellowship with millions and faithfulness to the faith of the mother who bore us!"

Must it not shame us? Must it not open our eyes? Must it not move us to solemn self-dedication, to resolve that we will keep the pearl bright and whole, that through life till death we will be and do all that God gives us power to be and do for the life and health of these Free Churches, of our Church, and of the faith to which they have attained?

Then it was noted how the first thing to attract these men was the freedom of our communion. And then one and all they found that they were at one with us in our Unitarianism. And the sermon concluded:—

We have had our disputations in our own ranks which stands foremost, by which our Churches should be known, their freedom or their Unitarian interpretation of the religious problem. But, behold! to these men the two have come together; there is no disseverance between them. The perfect liberty has led to the beautiful faith of the pure Fatherhood of God and Brotherhood of Man; and the beautiful faith itself has been the sure and certain guarantee that the liberty will never be curtailed. There is that in the orthodox theologies which drives men to the assertion of authority over other men's minds and consciences. There is that in the gospel commonly called Unitarian—which is indeed nothing else than the pure gospel of Jesus, expressed in terms of our modern day—which waters the roots of liberty and forbids the tyranny of Priest or Presbyter.

And so, while we clasp the hand of every pilgrim who comes to our fellowship from churches bound in the fetters of the creeds, let us pray God to make us more faithful in the heritage which he has given us, that every pilgrim who shall come may find a living Church of true and loving men and women serving the Kingdom of God in the spirit of Jesus Christ.

The October number of the Mill Hill Pulpit, which begins the eleventh volume of this publication of the Rev. Charles Hargrove's sermons, has for its subject "Our Children: The Nation's Wealth and Care." The following passage is characteristic of the feeling which pervades the whole discourse:—

Management by School Boards! Ratepayers' control! Womens' Right to Serve! No Clerical Monopoly!—I believe there is justice and urgency in these cries. But there is one cry which is not heard, which is of more importance, and in which Justice is more intimately concerned. It is what the children themselves call for, too young as yet to know the meaning of all this uproar; for their very presence among us is a silent but imperative demand that we should do all we can to fit them to fulfil their duties and hold their own in the life which is before them.

A statesman has lately proposed to the party whom he will not lead, a watchword by which they may without him march to power. Putting aside for the present all other measures and projects of reform, he asks us to take "Efficiency" for our motto and our word of appeal. The weakness of the suggestion is that it recommends to a party to take for its own that which all parties are agreed on. At the Treasury and Board of Trade, at the Admiralty and War Office, the country demands efficiency, and it is sought after, if not attained. Even at the Post Office pride is taken, however little it be justified, in the efficiency of the service. In one department of government alone would this seem to be a secondary consideration. In Education the denominations ask for fair treatment and the Church for favour, country and town alike murmur at the rates, and Governments dread the increase of cost; so restrictions are imposed and grants are cut down, if possible to check the ever-rising expenditure. Yet is this the one department whose work pays the best; it is the Making of Men and Women! is it not the business the most profitable that we can be engaged in?

Efficiency! That should be our cry! All the rest will follow. The best, and nothing less than the best, which the circumstances allow of, that should be our demand; and no schemes of management should commend themselves to us or be condemned by us, on other ground than that they are, or are not, the machinery best adapted to do the work, to do justice to the children, out of the raw material of human infancy to make the better folk that are to be.

"Truly the light is sweet and a pleasant thing it is for the eyes to behold the sun." Not only is it pleasant, but it is necessary that we should have abundance of sunlight to overcome disease and maintain health. Sir James Crichton-Browne proves this in a paper read by him at the jubilee meeting of the Manchester and Salford Sanitary Association just published in their "Proceedings." At the time of its delivery the audience was impressed by its value and interest as well as the oratory of the speaker, and a perusal of it in print adds to the impression. It recounts experiments by which it has been proved that typhoid bacilli are actually destroyed by exposure to the direct rays of the sun for a few hours, while in precisely similar circumstances in all respects, save that they are left in darkness, they flourish and increase at an alarming rate. It is also proved by experiments that it is not the heat of the sun, but the light that has this exterminating effect on disease germs.

Not only typhoid germs, but those of nearly all diseases, are weakened and destroyed by sunlight, but propagate rapidly in the darkness. Hence an abundant source of mischief in towns, where thousands of houses are crowded without direct sunlight, and with little light of any kind, and in warehouses and offices men and women work all day by artificial light. It is not altogether a new lesson which is taught by Sir James Crichton-Browne, but he brings it home forcibly and with the authority of the most recent research to support it. There will be epidemics and other noisome diseases as long as the sun is shut out and the disease germs are accommodated with congenial environment. If only every house could be built to catch all the sunlight there is, and something could be done effectively to dissipate the smoke cloud of our manufacturing towns and the winter fogs! ——

A notable article in the July number of the Quarterly Review concludes with the following striking passage:—

The East broods all the more deeply now that the Pax Britannica has so largely silenced the tumult of the outer world. It is almost certain that, if the great peace and reign of law and justice should last, many of the lower and grosser superstitions of India, the reflections of the former fears and terrors of an oppressed and afflicted people, must fade and vanish, and that with them the power of the old priesthood must decline. India may be like the sleeping princess. The touch of the healthier and saner Western life may at last wake her out of the trance which has for so many centuries bound her senses, and rekindle that fresh and objective view of things which makes itself felt in the earliest Hindu writings. On the other hand, the deep level thought of Indian sages may do much to spiritualise the too material life of Europeans, and make them assess the value of things on a truer scale. It will, perhaps, some day be said that the translation of the sacred books of the East in the nineteenth century marked the beginning of a new intellectual era, much as the translation of the Greek writers did in the fifteenth century. The world always seems to be awaiting the voice of the sage who shall discover the solution of the relations between renunciation and enjoyment, between thought and action, the life of the spirit and the life of the senses, moral order and freedom, the form of religion and its essence. In India such opposites are now in the field that from their collision may be struck the spark of truth. Who can tell that in some mud-cottage in a hamlet of the plains, or a shepherd's cottage in the hills, there may not at this moment be lying a babe from whose mouth some day will proceed that which millions will for ages accept as part of their guidance in the difficult journey of life?

Under the Stopford Brooke Lectureship Fund two courses of five lectures each are to be given by Mr. Stopford Brooke at University College during the present session on "The Rise of Naturalism or the Romantic Movement in Poetry in the Eighteenth Century." The first lecture, introductory to the whole course, will be given on Thursday evening, Nov. 6, in the Botanical Theatre, to be followed by four lectures on the poetry of James Thomson, Collins, Gray, and others. Of the second course, after Christmas, details will be announced later. There will be no free tickets issued to the general public for these lectures, as the managers do not wish to trench upon their Fund until the permanent lectureship is fully established. Tickets are to be sold to the public at 5s. for the course of five lectures, and 2s. 6d. to teachers. Shilling tickets for single lectures can be had at the door if there should be room. Annual subscriptions of 10s. or £1 are invited, which will entitle the subscriber to one or two tickets for the two courses, on application to the Secretary of the Fund at University College.

Unitarians Changing Residence.—Taking up the plea which Mr. Tarrant made at the opening of his Provincial letter last week, the Rev. A. Ashworth, of the York-street Non-subscribing Presbyterian Church, Belfast, urges country ministers to send word when any members of their congregations settle in Belfast, that they may be welcomed into the city church. For some years the York-street congregation has been zealous in the welcoming of new-comers, and there are, of course, other kindred churches in Belfast. But only the other day, Mr. Ashworth says, he found by the merest accident seven persons, who formerly belonged to country congregations, and unknown to him had been for "some years" in Belfast, with the result that five of them had become connected with a Methodist church.

LITERATURE.

THE ESSEX HALL LECTURE.*

The Essex Hall Lectures are given under a scheme of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association "for the delivery and subsequent publication of a lecture dealing with some aspect of the history and development of Christianity viewed from the standpoint of liberal and progressive thought." It is a significant fact that though the whole field of the history and development of Christianity is open to the lecturers, yet three out of the six lectures already given deal specifically with the question of the person and teaching of Jesus himself. In 1895 Professor Carpenter lectured on "The Relation of Jesus to His Age and Our Own." In 1897 the Rev. R. A. Armstrong took as his subject "The Significance of the Teaching of Jesus"; and now Professor Drummond gives us "Thoughts on Christology."

Dr. Drummond's lecture is mainly on what is called the "Christian Consciousness," which, to many minds at the present day, is the last stronghold of a retreating Christian faith. Those who know Dr. Drummond's Hibbert Lectures, and are acquainted with his attitude towards questions of theology, will be slow to suspect him of any weakness of theistic belief, or want of positive Christian doctrine; but it is a sign of the general attitude of religious thinkers at the present day that even he drops into the language of one who is fighting to retain something that he is in danger of losing. "If we would retain our Christianity at all," says Dr. Drummond, "we must frankly surrender this [the Biblical] position, and retreat to another stronghold of faith. . . . Is there such a stronghold—one that can stand unharmed amid the war of creeds and the assaults of doubt? There is, and it is called the Christian consciousness." (The italics of course are ours.)

Dr. Drummond summarises this Christian consciousness at first in general terms:—

> There is a graciousness and purity of soul, a tender regard for others, a self-forgetfulness of love, a glad and trustful acceptance of the divine will, a sense of intimate communion with God, a felt relationship with Christ, which we recognise as specifically Christian. When we meet a man in whom these traits are evident, we say, "Behold a Christian indeed, in whom there is no guile."

He then proceeds to elaborate the idea of the "facts of Christian consciousness on which our Christology must be founded," concluding with the following striking passage:—

> Christ has brought the love of God closer to human consciousness, and changed into a living sense of personal communion that large and vague belief with which men endeavoured to look into the infinite abyss of being, and adored the unseen Power whom none can find out unto perfection. It is indeed true that the consciousness of intimate communion with God is not limited to Christianity. To go no further afield, it finds clear and beautiful expression in certain passages of the Old Testament. But this deep and spiritual piety was so rare, that the first Christians seemed to themselves to have been lifted into a new divine atmosphere, and to be living encompassed by a spirit of heavenly love, such as they had not conceived in their pre-Christian state. This experience was connected with an awakened sense of sin; and that Divine Love which had spoken to their hearts in Christ, made them feel at once how alienated they had been from the life of God, and yet how close to them was God's love, forgiving all the past, and beseeching them to come and be reconciled, and live as his redeemed children. Love, they perceived, was of God; and the love which in Christ had filled their hearts with wonder and joy had its source in God, and was indeed the Spirit of God manifesting itself in man, and pleading through human lips and human hands. And still this experience lives; men ready to despair under the sense of sin and estrangement from God, feel in Christ the touch of Divine Grace, and become conscious that they are received into a communion with God which is the beginning of spiritual life, and the earnest of final victory.

It is obvious, however, that this "inner consciousness" can give us no answer to the question of the humanity or deity of Jesus, unless, indeed, it be taken as in itself evidence that he is more than man; and it must be on other grounds that Dr. Drummond has reached the same conclusion as Professor Carpenter and Mr. Armstrong—namely, that Jesus was man, and man only.

Even in dealing with the question of the present personal relation of Jesus to the devout Christian, he says, "That which father or mother, or brother or sister, or friend or teacher of long ago may be to the individual—messengers between the visible and the invisible—that Christ is to the Church." The only difference therefore appears to be that while the influence of others is limited by the selection of individuals, the influence of Christ is coextensive with the Christian Church.

It is difficult to understand on what ground Dr. Drummond claims for such a view of the person of Jesus the name of "Christology." We gather from his lecture that he is as absolute a humanitarian as Theodore Parker himself. Even his adoption of Professor Harnack's misleading emphasis upon the definite article, admitting the universal divine sonship of man, and then saying that nevertheless Jesus is the son of God, does not remove Jesus from the category in which other prophets and saints are contained.

There are, however, some statements in the Lecture which appear to be quite inconsistent with the purely humanitarian view; and there is also a curious inconsistency between the absolute comprehensiveness of some portions, and the limitation of other portions.

From the purely humanitarian and comprehensive point of view it is difficult to see exactly what is meant by the statement, "We can know the Father only through the spirit of the Son dwelling in our hearts by faith." If the "spirit of the Son" means merely a filial spirit, a trustful loving faithful mind, this is true enough, though it has no necessary connection with Jesus; but if it means that God can only be known to those who are consciously under the direct personal influence and guidance of Jesus of Nazareth, it can only be maintained by making Christianity the sole religion of the world, and branding all other so-called religions as mere ignorant delusion, or at any rate excluding them from any right to a belief in the universal love of God, and limiting them to a sense of his wisdom, power, and other similar attributes.

When we feel a great love and admiration for any personal friend, we are inclined to attribute to him more than is really due, and other influences are eclipsed and lost sight of. There is the same tendency in considering the characters of history and the part they have played, and their influence on the world and human life and thought. We think of Jesus as the greatest revealer of religious truth, and so tend to attribute to him all our highest and best ideas. According to Dr. Drummond, the soul of Jesus in the hearts of the first disciples "transfigured the universe into a vesture of Divine thought"; and he intimates in the passage, already quoted, that the sense of personal communion with God, though not peculiar to Christianity, is especially characteristic of it.

But to the first Christians, if this visible universe was a vesture of God it was a vesture which was speedily to be put off and burnt. They looked impatiently for the dissolution of the heavens and earth, and for a new heaven and a new earth where there should be no more sea. The thought of the divine glory of this present world as itself the vesture of God belongs rather to the Judaism of the Psalms and the Christianity of the eighteenth and nineteenth century poets, than to Jesus and his immediate disciples. And again, to this day, many of those who are most clearly conscious of direct communion with God find the fullest utterance of this sense in the words of Jewish psalms; while on the other hand, a vast number of Christians are so far from it, and have so entirely supplanted it by a sense of communion with Christ, that they take these very psalms and apply them to him. In place of "Yahveh is my Shepherd," the Christian in ten thousand churches sings "The King of Love my Shepherd is," and to the words "Thy rod and staff my comfort still," he adds, leaving no mistake possible as to the person addressed, "Thy cross before to guide me." The substitution of one's inner consciousness of Christ for a clear conception of Jesus of Nazareth as known to us through the historic records will ever tend to make him practically the substitute for God rather than the revealer of God.

"To reconceive the Christ," says Robert Elsmere, "is the special task of our age, though in some sort it has been the ever-recurring task of Europe since the beginning." The Christ of the Christian consciousness will be reconceived in a thousand different forms, according to the spirit of the age and the character and capacity of the individual in which the consciousness is found. Dr. Drummond's idea of Christianity is one that must be admired by all devout and faithful souls, whether it satisfies them or not. But as he himself says, to others this Christian consciousness confirms the doctrine of the incarnation, and of the fall without which the incarnation appears to them unnecessary and indeed futile. Again, to others, it especially differentiates the sheep from the goats, those who have it from those who have it not, the saved from the lost. It becomes a mark of essential divisions, not of the unity of man. What are we to say to this? Surely we cannot arbitrarily argue: My Christian consciousness is altogether true, and yours is largely, if not entirely, false. When we attempt to say what is and what is not the "Spirit of Christ," we are dependent entirely on the historical records; records which, perhaps, are more difficult to analyse and sift than any others that the world possesses, but which, like all historical records, may be compared and weighed and examined until some reasonable certainty as to underlying facts is obtained. And then we find new evidence of the greatness of the character of Jesus of Nazareth, in the very fact that it reasserts itself again after those eighteen centuries of myth and ecclesiasticism in all its natural human simplicity and grandeur.

But having once attained the clear conception of Jesus of Nazareth, the village carpenter, son of Joseph and Mary, who gathered the flowers and fed the birds at his father's door, learnt with his companions in the village school, worked with his father at the joiner's bench, taught by the wayside to simple men and women the way of life and holiness, gathered around him a few fishermen and village folk, dared the power of the whole Jewish hierarchy and the Roman Empire, and died on the cross for truth and righteousness, why should we dissipate all this concrete reality of human life, and say that Jesus is "a spirit of life which may diffuse itself, like a purifying atmosphere, through every variety of human vocation"? More, far more and greater than the changing ideas of the Christian consciousness, and the varying influence of a spiritual atmosphere, is the actual Jesus of Nazareth, as he was and is, prophet, saint, and martyr, first-born of many brethren, the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

Education is the great subject of the hour, and naturally fills a large place in the October reviews; but in the week of the re-assembling of Parliament interest is turned to a more practical quarter. In the Nineteenth Century and After, Sir John Gorst has a long article on the Bill, and the Bishop of Hereford renews his plea for conciliation; and then follows a symposium by eight writers, more or less closely connected with practical educational work, all of whom appear to have faith in the Bill—at least, as the starting point for effective and sorely-needed reform. But none of them appear to realise, as Sir Wemyss Reid does in his review of "Last Month," the ground and the weight of the Nonconformist objection to the proposed arrangements as to the management of "Voluntary" schools.

In the Contemporary, Mr. Augustine Birrell writes in his own way on "Politics and Education," with some useful reminders as to the past history of the progress of Education in this country. Mr. Birrell thinks that if only laymen will seriously take the matter up a reasonable agreement can easily be arrived at as to religious teaching in all the schools, which, of course, must be under public management, and then people will be able to attend to the vital questions as to education itself.

If only once this odious, sham "religious difficulty" could be got finally rid of, Education would progress by leaps and bounds. An opportunity has unexpectedly presented itself when the difficulty can be got rid of, if only laymen in Parliament and out of it will speak their mind. If they do not, no living man will see the end of a horrid conflict which, so long as it lasts, must always impede Education and disgrace Religion.

In the Empire Review are two articles on "The Nonconformists and the Education Bill," the first by the Bishop of Rochester, who asks whether the Bill is unjust to Nonconformists, and replies that there has been in the past, and must be under the new proposals, a certain amount of injustice on both sides, and the aim must be to attain the fairest possible balance of interests. All schools must be brought into line in the matter of efficiency and support. Churchmen cannot be satisfied with "undenominational" religious teaching. Alternative schemes of instruction must be allowed in all schools. The second article is by Dr. Guinness Rogers, and is a vigorous statement of "Nonconformist Objections." His conclusion may be quoted:—

> The first, and in some respects the principal question, is that of control. The sooner Mr. Balfour learns that we cannot be finally disposed of by mere parliamentary adroitness, the better for the true interests of the Established Church itself. The denominational schools must cease to be voluntary when the State undertakes their entire support. Their buildings have been to a considerable extent provided by their own friends, and the State is in justice bound to compensate for their use. When that has been arranged, and the schools have been placed under a board of management such as that indicated by the Bishop of Hereford, there comes the question of the religious teaching to be given. I believe that even that vexata quæstio will be more easily dealt with when the point of management has first been settled. When it has once been recognised that the schools belong to the nation, the way will be cleared for a decision. Neither party can claim to be the nation, and the nation must pay due respect to both. This can, I venture to think, be done only in one way—the restriction of the work of the State to secular teaching. How this can be best effected is a matter for subsequent consideration.

Of articles on other subjects we may note "An open Letter to the Registrar-General" by the Hon. Stephen Coleridge in the Contemporary, dealing with various medical statistics in which the question of Vivisection is involved, and in the Nineteenth Century and After, a further paper by Sir Robert Anderson, "More about Professional Criminals," and Mr. W. F. Lord's moderate appreciation of "Jane Austen's Novels." In the Monthly Review will be found a brief article by Sir Martin Conway on an old lost portrait of Francis of Assisi, dated 1212, with a reproduction of the ancient copy of it now at Pisa. Another illustrated article of a very different kind is on Rodolphe Töpffer of Geneva, "Draughtsman, Humorist and Schoolmaster" (1799-1846).

SHORT NOTICES.

Shall We Understand the Bible, by the Rev. T. Rhondda Williams, is not a new book, but a second edition of a work that justly merits to repeat its success. As an introduction to Bible study, as distinguished from Bible reading, this little volume may be confidently recommended. It embodies a series of lectures given in the school-room of Horton-lane Congregational Church, Bradford; and the author's aim is to demonstrate in a tongue "understanded of the people" the value to religious life of the Bible as purified from secondary elements in the refining fires of the Higher Criticism. Its force, lucidity, and simplicity of diction, and its excellent type and a small price should make it a favourite with those to whose lot it falls to commend or present books of this sort to the young in years or experience. Here are a few sentences by way of illustration: "Men asked then as now: 'Shall we give up the Bible?' The right answer now as then is: 'No, but you shall give up your false theory of the Bible, and cease to talk ignorantly about it, or else in the march of thought you will be left behind.'" (P. 74.)

"The greater Bible is the whole world in all its history, and the Hebrew Scriptures are part of it. In the whole evolution of life is to be found the mind of God. The most important chapters of that wonderful story are written in the Bible, and their value is not diminished but increased when their relation to the whole is recognised. One of the results of this is that it was never so much studied. . . . The fact is that criticism, much abused by the ignorant, and sometimes made the subject of poor jokes by men who have only touched its fringes with incompetent fingers, has effected the resurrection of the Bible into modern life." (A. and C. Black. 1s. net.)

A fourth edition of Mr. Seebohm Rowntree's Poverty: A Study of Town Life, issued at a greatly reduced price within a year of its first publication, is a welcome sign of the widespread interest aroused by this painful but invaluable work, with its minute and exact analysis of the conditions of life among the poor in York. The first edition was fully noticed in our issue of Jan. 4, and we simply note here that this cheap edition reproduces the whole book in the same type, though on thinner paper, and all the illustrations, with the exception of some plans of houses, and the first map of the city. The map showing the number and position of licensed houses is included. (Macmillan and Co., 2s. 6d. net.)

The late Dean Plumtre's translation of Sophocles, first published in 1865, and subsequently revised, is now re-issued in two dainty volumes, bound in limp leather, in form similar to the Dean's "Aeschylos," and his "Life of Dante," and translation of the "Divina Commedia," already noticed in these columns. (Isbister and Co. 5s.)

Jane Austen's Pride and Prejudice and Northanger Abbey come to us in a new "Hampshire Edition," in clear type, with quaint frontispiece and cover. All we want is leisure to enjoy these inimitable books. (Brimley Johnson, 2s. 6d. and 2s. net.) With these, also, in the "York Library," Two Love Stories from the Doctor, &c., by Robert Southey, and Rosamund Gray, by Charles Lamb, with etched portraits of the authors for frontispiece. (Brimley Johnson, 2s. 6d. net, each.)

Reason and Revelation, by J. R. Illingworth, M.A., D.D. (Macmillan and Co., 7s. 6d.), we reserve for fuller notice.

THE LATE WILLIAM ROBERTS, OF MADRAS.

News has been received of the death, on Sept. 17, of the aged William Roberts, who for more than half a century superintended the work of a humble Unitarian mission in Madras, supported by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. Of recent years a small annual grant was made to Mr. Roberts, chiefly for the comfort of his old age, the expectation of any permanent result from the mission having been long since abandoned. It is now the definitely accepted policy of the Association not to enter upon any independent Unitarian mission work in India, but by every available means to support and strengthen the native movement of the Brahmo Somaj.

Not that William Roberts was a European. His father, an earlier William Roberts, received his name on being baptised as a Christian, Aug. 3, 1789, in St. James's Church, Piccadilly, being at that time an Indian serving-man on a visit to this country. He was a native of the populous district some fifty miles west of Madras, and being left an orphan as a boy of about ten made his way to Madras, where he was seized and sold as a slave by some Mohammedans. Sailing in the service of an English doctor he was at Bombay when his master died, but not before securing to the youth his liberty. He had during that time renounced his native religion and become a Mohammedan, and his occupation for more than thirty years was as servant to Europeans. In that capacity he came altogether three times to England, being also for some time in France. He met with various vicissitudes in service, and as a young man of eighteen was baptised a Christian as above noted. On a later visit to London he chanced upon some Unitarian literature, and when in 1813 he had finally returned to his own country he had with him Theophilus Lindsey's Revised Prayer-book and "Apology," Priestley's "Corruptions of Christianity," and other Unitarian works. He had no opportunity while in London of making himself known to the Unitarian community, but on his own initiative he and some others opened a place of meeting for Unitarian worship in Madras, and in 1817 he addressed a letter to the Rev. Thomas Belsham, of Essex-street Chapel, telling the story of his life, and asking for sympathy and help in his efforts to spread the truths of Unitarianism among his own people. In the following year the Rev. Thomas Rees, secretary of the Unitarian Society, opened an official correspondence with him, and a few years later funds were found to enable him to leave service and devote himself to the work of teaching and as a preacher of Unitarianism. A native school was established, and Unitarian worship was regularly maintained.

In April, 1838, William Roberts, the elder, passed away, being close upon seventy years of age. At that time the hopes with which the mission had been at first liberally supported had been disappointed; but the movement did not altogether die out, and a few years later grants again began to be made to a son of the first missionary, the William Roberts whose career of humble and patient labour is now closed at the age of eighty-two. He had been a clerk in the office of the Bishop of Madras, but was dismissed when it became known that he was a Unitarian, and he then took up his father's work. He laboured with acceptance among his own people through a long course of years, and was highly respected also by Europeans, who sympathised with his efforts. But, as we have said, there was not permanent vitality in the movement, and our hopes for the progress of liberal religious thought and life in Madras, as in Bengal, now centre chiefly in the Brahmo Somaj. Peace to the memory of the good man whose work is done!

THE UNITARIAN HOME MISSIONARY COLLEGE.

The opening address for the new session of the College was given in the Memorial Hall on Wednesday, Oct. 8, by the Principal, the Rev. Alexander Gordon, M.A., Mr. F. Monks being in the chair.

The address, dealing chiefly with the history and character of early Nonconformist academies, was a timely vindication of the public spirit and love of education which from the first has been a great tradition of Nonconformity. In the face of persecution, from the time of the passing of the Act of Uniformity in 1662 Nonconformists had persisted in the maintenance of "university learning" in a succession of academies, of which Richard Frankland's at Rathmel was the first. Those early academies did not profess to grant degrees, but had they done so, Mr. Gordon said, no doubt the degree of Rathmel in the seventeenth century, or of Daventry in the eighteenth, would have meant a great deal more than those of Oxford or Cambridge. Frankland was entitled to be regarded as the rescuer of Nonconformity from destruction at the hands of its oppressors. Persecutions and excommunications dogged him during all his remaining days, and it was only by constant removals from corner to corner of Yorkshire and Lancashire that he was able to keep his academy going during the twenty-eight years preceding his death. One hardly knew whether, indeed, to admire more the unflinching tenacity of the middle-aged tutor or the brave young courage of the students who followed him in his wanderings. Frankland's example was followed quickly, and in a very few years academies had sprung up in all parts of the country. The topics dealt with in the academies covered the whole range of needful knowledge as then realised; from a course which extended over four years nothing that was deemed desirable was deliberately omitted. The immediate work of the Nonconformist academy was to fit and equip men for public duty, not only in the ministry, but in all the professions. Far more was this their aim than to make Nonconformists. They had to deal primarily with a class of people who were Nonconformists already, expelled from the unity of the nation into Nonconformity; and they made it their task to develop in that class the powers which would qualify them to take their place in the work of their country, to do their part in forming its future, to take their share in building up on sound principles its prosperity, to advance its culture, and to ensure its progress. These academies had rendered service of the first importance to education in England.

A VICAR AND HIS WEAKER BRETHREN.

At the recent annual meeting of the Temperance Society connected with Bank-street Chapel, Bolton, the President, the Rev. C. J. Street, read the following letter from the Vicar of Bolton, who had accepted an invitation to be present, and had been announced as one of the speakers:—

"When you were good enough to ask me to come and say a few words at the meeting of the Bank-street Temperance Society you did so, I am sure, because you regarded me as a man anxious to promote the cause of temperance. In that capacity I accepted your invitation, feeling it to be a privilege to have the opportunity of speaking to a body of my fellow-townsmen on this subject. I could not indeed have expected my hearers to listen to what I believe to be the weightiest plea of righteousness which a man can urge upon his fellow-men. They would not have wished me to connect the cause of temperance with the Gospel which the Church holds in trust for the world; and I did not mean to do so. But, on the other hand, I did not intend, nor did you expect me, to compromise by anything I did or said one jot of the Christian teaching which the Unitarian body is unable to accept. And I was willing to come to the meeting as an earnest well-wisher, to show my sympathy with you in the good work of temperance. But I have found, to my great regret, that my action in coming to Bank-street is certain to be much misunderstood. Many, looking simply to the fact that I had taken part in your meeting in your schoolroom, would be led to fancy that I saw no difference between the positions of the Churchman and the Unitarian. They would not understand (as they easily would if the meeting were a public one in the Town Hall) that our co-operation was based solely on the principles of temperance work. They would look simply to the fact that I appeared to be taking part in the proceedings of your religious community. I am unhappy at the thought that my action may in this way mislead and trouble my weak brethren, and I should greatly blame myself if I found that it had this effect. Therefore, with very great reluctance, and apologising heartily for the inconvenience which I may cause, I venture to ask if you will kindly liberate me from my engagement. Believe me that I do so in no narrow or exclusive spirit, for indeed I heartily wish Godspeed to your excellent temperance work, and will gladly co-operate with you in it on neutral ground. I am only afraid that if I came to you at Bank-street I should cause misunderstanding, which I have no right to cause, and give rise to sorrow in some whose feelings I am bound to treat with tenderness and respect."

Mr. Street also read the reply he sent to Mr. Henn, in which he said:—

"I fail to see how your religious position would be in any way compromised by appearing at a temperance meeting in our schoolroom any more than I gave up my Unitarianism by speaking on Saturday night at a temperance meeting in a Wesleyan school, with the minister in the chair. And as for the association of the Gospel with the temperance cause, it would have been most acceptable to us to hear what you had to say on that subject; for, in spite of theological and ecclesiastical differences, it is one which ought to appeal to all Christians. However, you are, of course, the best judge of what you ought or ought not to do, and how much can be legitimately conceded to 'weak brethren.'" On this great question, Mr. Street observed, he had hoped there was common ground for united work, and he deplored that the present situation had arisen; but he was still hopeful of the dawn of brighter days, when even Church of England clergymen would address meetings in any Nonconformist building.

OUR CHURCH POLITY.

Sir,—The criticism in your leading article, two numbers ago, upon my paper on "Organisation" in the Seed Sower, may perhaps be fairly summed up in the words, "Quite sound in theory, but must not be reduced to practice." You, as well as I, "asking for a consistent Church polity on the principle of undogmatic fellowship, see in the National Conference, which is representative of our Free Churches, the natural completion of such a system." But, you urge, the British and Foreign Unitarian Association actually, if with little logic, occupies the field "as a central Treasury and Administrator of funds for the strengthening of our Churches"; and your conclusion is that we should defer all attempts to form a National Union of Churches until the members of the individual Churches, and the constituent congregations in the District Unions, have recognised the duties of brotherhood and proved themselves capable of united action.

I had anticipated this reply in a portion of my paper which you do not quote. May I venture to put in other words some considerations which tell against your conclusion?

In the first place, if the work now done by the B. and F.U.A. is any reason for stopping short at all in the work of organisation, it is a reason for abandoning the work altogether. Mere postponement will not solve but aggravate the difficulty, for whenever the time seems to have come for resuming our efforts, the same obstacle will still have to be overcome, and the prescriptive right of the Unitarian Association to be our only general almoner will simply have been strengthened by lapse of time.

In the second place, I have not proposed, or met with any proposal, that the B. and F.U.A. should suddenly cease to make grants to necessitous congregations. As a member of the Association I shall give my humble support to its executive in their present policy so long as the needs of the Churches are not supplied in a better way. It is not the weakening of the B. and F.U.A., but the strengthening of Conference, that I have at heart. If Conference can be enabled to fulfil its natural functions, a time may indeed come when the funds of the Unitarian Association, no longer required for this special purpose, will be set free for use in ways that more exactly carry out the objects defined in its constitution. Even if this involved the diversion from Essex Hall of half its annual subscriptions and donations, the conjoint effect would be, as anybody can see for himself in its last balance sheet, to enrich, not to impoverish, the Association.

But, in the third place, I do not anticipate any such results. Money subscribed to good objects is a measure of the real interest felt in those objects. So long as the Unitarian Association continues to adhere to the principle of subserving truth by leaving truth free, so long will its roll of members, and their zeal for its success, and their willingness to give, increase with the increasing prevalence of that principle. The growth of a great Church to which that principle is dear cannot hurt, cannot but help, all societies which further it.

And, in the fourth place, if I am forced incredulously to suppose the case that we must choose between the growth of a Church of truth and freedom, and the maintenance of the subscription list of a denominational society, still I ask, is there room for hesitation? How many members of the B. and F.U.A. itself would hesitate for a moment? The very principles which have led us to join that Association would constrain us to desire fellowship in worship rather than co-operation in the diffusion of our principles. How could we unite to diffuse principles which we declined to live by?

Lastly, the contention that we must wait for our individual Churches and District Associations to develop "the true spirit of devotion and self-sacrifice and mutual helpfulness," before we can pronounce them "fit to take their place in a National Union of Churches," seems to me to involve the maternal fallacy of refusing to let a boy enter the water until he can swim. These very virtues are the natural fruit of the Church-spirit, which is the inspiration of this effort, and will grow in breadth and strength to its success. What can be said for the District Associations that does not apply, in vastly greater measure, to the inclusive association which I advocate? Why, in these days of easy intercourse, should we cut our Church up into local fragments, increasing the difficulties of each, limiting its resources, cutting off the contagion of enthusiasm in a multitude, rending that body of Christ in which all men who love God's truth are members one of another? No difficulty has been urged which seems worthy to make those hesitate for a moment who feel that upon us, upon us especially, has been laid the duty of speaking one clear word from God, and that the voice with which we can most reasonably speak it is the voice of a united Church.

THE PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY MEETING.—A CORRECTION.

Sir,—Your report of the special meeting of the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire refers to the amendment which I moved, and Mr. Poynting seconded, as one "condemning the [Education] Bill simply for educational inefficiency." My amendment, in fact, expressed the opinion that the Bill is defective "in that it fails to provide for the management by the ratepayers of schools supported by the rates; that it fails to provide for the unsectarian training of teachers; and that it fails to make due provision for the urgent needs of secondary education." This amendment differs from the resolution in two points—(1) it does not discredit the new education authorities; (2) it invites the Government to amend the Bill. In each of these points it agrees with the resolution moved by Mr. Bowie, seconded by Mr. W. Long, and carried at the B. and F.U.A. meeting. The same question about "reconstruction" which was decided in one sense in Newcastle was thus raised and decided in the other sense in Manchester; but that was before Mr. Chamberlain's Birmingham speech had made it clear that the Bill will not be withdrawn, but may be amended.

MELBOURNE JUBILEE FUND.

Sir,—The Rev. R. H. Lambley, M.A., and his congregation at Melbourne are appealing for aid towards a Special Jubilee Fund of £500 which is being raised for church expenses and missionary work to be expended during the next few years. The British and Foreign Unitarian Association have made a grant of £100, and I have also received the following private contributions:—

Buckton, Mrs. George ...	5	0	0
Eckersley, C.	10	0	0
Gair, H. W.	1	1	0

JOHN POUNDS HOME FOR GIRLS, PORTSMOUTH.

Sir,—May we call your readers' attention to the above institution? Financial assistance is at the present time absolutely necessary if the work is to go on.

We have suffered considerably by the death of some liberal subscribers, as well as from a somewhat limited response to our appeal.

At least a sum of £100 is urgently necessary in order to carry on the work till the end of February, when the next financial year begins.

May we hope that Unitarians will come forward and save the work from lapsing?

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

Very sorry! but you see the Column is crowded out just here, and must wait till next week. It will be by Miss F. E. Cooke, and will be about "Hitch Your Waggon to a Star." What does that mean, and who said it?

THE CHURCH CONGRESS.

The various sessions of the Church Congress at Northampton last week provided an abundance of thoughtful papers and interesting discussions. Two, however, in particular stand out from the rest in their claim upon the interest of Protestant Dissenters: the conference on "Home Reunion," which immediately followed the President's opening address, and that on "The Miracles and Supernatural Character of the Gospels." This last was announced on the official programme as a sectional subject only, but it was remarkable both for the number of distinguished scholars who took part in it and for the outspokenness of one or two of them. Five papers were submitted, and, taken as a whole, they mark a new and important stage in the attitude of the Church of England towards miracles. Not one of them made more than the slightest allusion to the old claim that the miracles of Jesus Christ are in themselves evidence of his supernatural character. The assumption which was implicit in all these addresses was that the miracle stories are hard to believe, and form a hindrance rather than a help to the acceptance of the Gospel narrative. The line of argument taken by Professor Swete, who opened the session, is expressed in the clause: "Difficulties of belief become infinitesimal when placed in the light of the Incarnation." Dr. Wace, who followed, took up a position which reminds us of his duel with Huxley in the old days: "We may boldly say that the falsehood of the testimony borne to the miracles in the Gospels would be more miraculous than the miracles themselves." Professor Sanday, repeating what he has said more than once before, argued that though miracles, as they then seemed to be, certainly happened, they might not be what we should call miracles now. "The will, as we have experience of it, is subject to certain conditions and operates within certain limits. The main question is whether a higher Personality, and a higher Will, than ours would not transcend these conditions and limitations." After a paper by Dr. Watson, who said that "the miracles worked by our Lord during his earthly life are not severally and individually articles of faith," the conference was closed by an admirably clear and forcible address by Dr. Rashdall. Guarding himself, in the first place, against the fallacy of assuming the a priori impossibility of miracles, he added :—

> But practically our knowledge of nature is sufficient for us to say that some events, if they occurred, must be violations of natural law. Some events could not be accepted on any testimony whatever. . . . I see no reason to think that, because our Lord was a unique personality, he should have been endowed with the power of violating the laws of Nature; but he may well have possessed an exceptional degree of the kind of power which in lower degrees is not unparalleled at other periods of history.

Dr. Rashdall's conclusion was an earnest plea for "liberty of thought and of reverent expression on this matter." Young men to-day would no longer believe in Christianity on account of miracles.

> Make them believe in Christ on moral and spiritual grounds, and they may or may not come to believe in miracles afterwards. The unique revelation of God made in the Person of Jesus Christ must be its own evidence. Spiritual things must be spiritually discerned.

The view so lucidly expressed in these words is one which has long been held by many clergymen, but this is the first time, we believe, that it has been granted a place upon the programme of a Church Congress. One point calls for notice. Not one of the last three essayists make any reference to the miraculous conception and birth of Jesus. That miracle is one which cannot be explained by their theory of natural human powers possessed by Jesus in an exceptional degree; but it is one in which all Churchmen are called upon to profess belief whenever they join in public worship, by the recitation of the Apostles' Creed. The advantage of a creedless communion could hardly be more signally exemplified.

The conference on "Home Reunion" was the occasion of an eloquent address by Canon Henson. The Church Times genially alludes to it as "frothy language, exactly representing the aspirations of the uninstructed." The comment is interesting for the side-light which it throws on the kind of instruction which our contemporary admires. We must modestly rank ourselves among the uninstructed, for we agree cordially with the spirit of this paper. We agree with Canon Henson in lamenting the evils of unchecked denominationalism. The checks which he would be glad to see imposed are not those of civic contraint, but of "responsibility to the Christian society as a whole," and "an adequate perception of the scandal of religious rivalry." It is too true that the spirit of commercial competition, rather than the spirit of brotherly co-operation, animates the activity of the different Churches. Those elements in Church life which make for fitness to survive in the stress of a worldly struggle are cultivated with ardour; and they are not the highest elements. "In this connection fitness is determined rather by resolute worldliness than by spiritual excellence." An apparent contradiction of this verdict might be found in the Evangelical Free Church Federation. But to a closer scrutiny that alliance of militant sects seems rather to resemble the great commercial combinations which are so frequent in our day. It exists to enable its members to fight more effectually for such interests as they have in common; but it leaves their individual rivalries as they were. This is, indeed, very far from being the whole truth about the sectarian Churches. They are doing noble work, and upholding high ideals; but both their ideals and their work suffer from the spirit of denominational competition.

Canon Henson recognises the futility of all schemes of reunion which take as their basis the episcopal theory of orders. Such proposals, indeed, cannot properly be described as schemes of reunion; they are schemes of comprehension.

> To invite non-episcopalian Churches to treat with you, and, at the same time, to propound as a preliminary assumption the invalidity of the ministry. . . . is to perpetrate an absurdity as well as to offer an insult . . . Unless you will concede the character of Churches to those with whom you propose to negotiate, you have no rational basis of negotiation.

He believes, however, that the rigid Episcopalian theory which has been so prominent of late among the Anglican clergy is not shared by English Churchmen in general. They would rejoice, he is convinced, to see their pulpits opened "under due safeguards" to the great spiritual teachers of other English-speaking Churches. This may well be so. There is much evidence to show that Neo-catholic intolerance has not made any great progress, even yet, in the mass of the laity. But what are the "safeguards" which Canon Henson would propose? He falls back, after all, upon a doctrinal test. The intruders must "satisfy the conditions of orthodoxy proposed by the Lambeth Conference so long ago as 1888."

It is not, however, by any consensus in theological doctrine that a permanent and genuine reunion of the Churches can be brought about. No basis which is less broad than that of religion itself, the love of God and of man, can provide a common foundation for all religious societies. In earnest words, which awaken a response in the heart of every thoughtful and religious man, Canon Henson speaks of the danger which threatens us all, "a danger to vital and common principles, not of Protestantism, but of Christian civilisation itself." That danger, the spirit that is the negation of high ideals, of generous effort, of self-sacrificing love, is great enough to move all the sects, did they but realise it, to draw together in defence of essential things. And nothing less than the essential things can be strong enough and holy enough to unite them.

THEOLOGY AS AFFECTED BY THE RESULTS OF BIBLICAL CRITICISM.*

BY ROBERT B. DRUMMOND, B A.

"Philosophy," wrote Voltaire in his Philosophical Dictionary, under the head of Moses, "philosophy of which we sometimes pass the boundaries, researches of antiquity, and the spirit of discussion and criticism, have been carried so far, that several learned men have finally doubted if there ever was a Moses, and whether this man was not an imaginary being, such as were Perseus, Bacchus, Atlas . . . and so many other heroes of romance whose lives and prowess have been recorded." I have quoted these words merely in order to make the remark—a truism to most of us—that long before Robertson Smith or Colenso there were learned men who denied not only that the Pentateuch was written by Moses, but even the very existence of Moses himself. In like manner, long before our time, the dissonances of the four Gospels were pointed out, and their authenticity called in question, by Thomas Paine in his "Age of Reason," by the French Encyclopædists and the English Deists. But then all these men were the avowed enemies of Christianity and stood in open opposition to the ecclesiastical powers. What must strike everyone as so remarkable about the criticism of the present day—what is known as the Higher Criticism—is that it is not the enemies of the Church but her servants; it is the watchmen of Israel, the pledged guardians of the orthodox faith, who are teaching, certainly in a more reverent spirit, and as the result of more scholarly investigations, but still teaching the very same things as formerly were taught exclusively by men who called themselves Deists and were denounced by the Church and the public as infidels; and this amid a silence which, if it does not prove the prelude to a great storm of rage and invective, can only be regarded as implying a very large amount of acquiescence and acceptance.

The Encyclopædia Biblica.

The doctrines of the Higher Criticism, it is well known, are to be found set forth in their most pronounced as well as their most scholarly form, in the lately published volumes of the "Encyclopædia Biblica," of which the chief editor is the Rev. Dr. T. K. Cheyne, canon of Rochester and Oriel Professor of the Interpretation of Scripture in Oxford; and so long as Dr. Cheyne holds his chair and his canonry, it must be presumed that these doctrines are tolerated in the Anglican Church. So far as the Old Testament only is concerned, this might be allowed to pass almost without notice; for so completely have such questions as the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch, the duplicate or manifold authorship of the Book of Isaiah, or the date of Daniel been disposed of by the scientific criticism of the last half-century, that to maintain the traditional views would be scarcely possible to anyone whose judgment was not overborne by invincible prejudice. Nor would it be matter for surprise if, in a learned work of this kind, the Gospels themselves were treated with a considerable amount of freedom and account taken of their doubtful authorship, their uncertain date, and the many internal discrepancies a careful examination brings to light; but when we find that not only is this so, but that the apostolic authorship of the Fourth Gospel, long so warmly defended as the great bulwark of orthodox Christianity, is frankly abandoned, whatever indirect connection it may have had with the aged John, that of the thirteen Pauline epistles not even Baur's four are allowed to be genuine, but all relegated to a later generation, finally, and most startling of all, that the accounts of the nativity of Jesus in the Gospels of Matthew and Luke, including his birth at Bethlehem of the Virgin Mary, are denied all historical character and treated as pure mythology, we begin to ask where this is to end, and whether the Church of England is in a fair way to give up supernatural Christianity altogether, and accept in its stead the principles of rational faith.

The Supernatural Birth.

On the last point mentioned — the supernatural birth—let me be a little more particular. The article on Jesus, by the late Professor A. B. Bruce, of the Free Church of Scotland, informs us that Jesus Christ, a Jew by race, was born in Palestine, but says not a word about the miraculous circumstances recorded by our evangelists, nor does it even indicate Bethlehem as the place of his birth. On the contrary, it speaks once, incidentally, of Nazareth as his "native town." There is only one passage bearing on the question of Christ's divinity, and it might have been written by a Unitarian. Referring to the saying, "No one knoweth the Son save the Father," &c., as recorded in the Gospels of Matthew and Luke, and as current among the Gnostics, Professor Bruce remarks that "under either form the Logion implies a peculiar relation, if not to God at least to the conception of God as Father, that of one who claimed to have given currency to the name." But it is in the article on Mary that this subject is most fully discussed. It is there shown by arguments which, to an unprejudiced mind, may well appear conclusive, that the myth of the Virgin-birth formed no part of the primitive evangelical tradition, that it was originally absent even from Luke's poetical narrative, that it was equally unknown to Paul and the author of the Fourth Gospel, and consequently that the "family secret" of which orthodox theologians talk so complacently had never any existence but in their own imagination. It is unnecessary to enter into these arguments here. It is true that this article is by a foreign theologian, but the fact remains that in a work published under such high auspices, and intended for circulation among the clergy and laity both of the Anglican and other Churches, one of the fundamental doctrines of the Christian religion as hitherto understood and received, is explicitly protested against, and declared to be erroneous.

That such doctrines can be put forward in such a work is surely a proof that even the most radical conclusions of the Higher Criticism are much more widely accepted than, so far, we have been accustomed to suppose.

I have been asked to say what, in my opinion, will be the effect of this Higher or Literary Criticism of the Bible upon theology.

What Criticism has left.

Well, the first impulse of the natural man would certainly be to say that its effect must be to overturn and destroy the entire structure, leaving not one stone upon the top of another. To the great majority of believing men and women the Bible is the very foundation of their faith. If you take away the Bible as the Word of God, and as containing his inspired message to mankind and the revelation of his Son, and begin to treat it as you would any other ancient book, they feel that they have no longer any ground on which to stand, that everything worth having is gone from them. The Unitarian, whose faith has never depended on the mere letter of a book, will not feel this, but he will think that as a consequence of the new teaching the Bible will presently take its legitimate place among the sacred literatures of mankind, as simply one though it may be the best of a class, and that the Trinitarian theology will give place to a pure Theism. It would be rash, however, to assume that these consequences will necessarily, or at any rate quickly, follow.

First as to the Bible, it is clear that the doctrine of verbal inspiration is irreconcilable with any degree or kind of literary criticism; but then the doctrine of verbal inspiration has been long abandoned by Biblical scholars of repute, and was at no time the authorised creed of any Church. On the other hand, it is contended that all our knowledge of inspiration must be derived from the Scriptures themselves, that it is not inconsistent with errors in matters of fact if such errors there are, or even with imperfect ethical or religious teaching, and is not affected by altered views of date and authorship. Pseudonymity, we are told, has been a common device of authors in all ages, and there is no reason why it might not be adopted, or sanctioned, by the Holy Spirit. Whether this view does not involve a begging of the question, I must leave it to yourselves to decide; nor need we discuss here to what extent the literary methods of the Bible ever transgress (supposing the critics to be right) the rules of literary honesty. It is probable that the theologian will continue for a long time to satisfy himself with such reasonings as I have suggested, nor can it be expected that he will very readily admit that by treating the Bible like any other book he at once takes from it that exceptional character which has hitherto been regarded as its chief claim to the love and reverence of mankind.

Effect on the Doctrine of the Virgin Birth.

But now as to the other point to which

* A Paper read at the Conference of the B. and F.U.A. in the Church of the Divine Unity, at Newcastle-on-Tyne, Tuesday, Oct. 6.

I have directed attention—to give up that clause of the Apostles' Creed which affirms that Jesus Christ was born of the Virgin Mary is surely to strike a fatal blow at the doctrine of the Incarnation, and thus subvert the very foundations of the orthodox faith! Here again, however, it is well not to be too hasty. If it is correct to say that neither Paul nor the author of the Fourth Gospel knew anything of this supernatural occurrence—and Paul, at least, is wholly silent on the subject, except for one remark which distinctly tells us that Jesus came of the seed of David according to the flesh—it can scarcely be said that the truth of the gospel-story is indispensable to the orthodox faith in Christ's Divinity. The Fourth Gospel, while passing over the circumstances of Christ's birth, announces him, in the words of Philip to Nathanael, as Jesus of Nazareth, the son of Joseph, and reports, without comment, the objection raised by some of the people to his Messianic claim, Hath not the scripture said, That Christ cometh of the seed of David, and out of the town of Bethlehem, where David was? It is true this is generally understood as a merely ironical suppression of the fact well known to the readers of the Gospel that Jesus really was born at Bethlehem; but it seems a little improbable that the evangelist would have taken such knowledge for granted on the part of every reader, even had he possessed it himself; and, at any rate, he can hardly have set a high value on a circumstance which he does not think it worth while to record. But apart from the Virgin-birth, it may be asked: What proof is there of the Incarnation at all? Perhaps the true answer is that there is none; but the question may also be asked: Would the Virgin-birth prove it? The believer may well prefer to rely upon the self-evidencing nature of the revelation of God in Christ, rather than on such precarious support as a physical miracle incapable of proof, and many will agree with Professor Schmiedel that by the doctrine of the Virgin-birth Jesus is lowered rather than exalted. According to this writer the doctrines of the pre-existence and the incarnation preceded that of the supernatural birth, which was really introduced under pagan influences to fit the Divine nature already ascribed to Jesus, the texts in John themselves supplying the motive which prompted the legend. It may, perhaps, be considered an indirect confirmation of this view that, like the Gospel according to St. John, the Athanasian Creed makes no reference to the Virgin-birth.

What the average Layman will think.

A recent essay by Mr. Augustine Birrell on "The Evidences of Christianity" furnishes us with a good example of the effect which the work of the Higher Critics is likely to have on the mind of the intelligent layman who desires, while keeping an open mind for whatever can justify itself to his reason, to remain at the same time moderately orthodox.

"Conscience," says Mr. Birrell, "not only makes cowards of us all, but theists of a good many. Whence comes this love of justice 'dwelling between the endless jar of right and wrong'? From believing in Conscience you come to believe in God. Believing in God you chance one day to recognise in the reported words of Jesus the notes of Deity. Never man spoke like this man. You believe Christ to be Divine. Believing him to be Divine, it is impossible to believe that

> Far hence he lies
> In the lone Syrian town,
> And on his grave with shining eyes
> The Syrian stars look down.

No; He rose from the dead, not because to rise from the dead is a convincing thing to do, but because, being Divine, He could not do otherwise. Had He not risen, He would not have been God. Having risen, it seems to follow, as the night the day, that the Spirit of God should remain upon the earth God had visited, to work upon the hearts of men all down the ages. The mission of the Comforter is as inevitable after the Ascension as was the Resurrection after the death upon the cross. If you are so minded, and find as a matter of daily experience that the Spirit of God is coming down to you through sacramental channels, attested by the authority of the Church, who can say you nay?"

This is certainly a short and easy method of arriving at a faith in the resurrection and divinity of Jesus Christ, and not only that, but in the power of the sacraments and the authority of the Church. Still, if this reasoning satisfies a man of Mr. Birrell's intelligence it is likely to suffice for many who have neither his learning nor his ability.

A Surer Foundation.

At the same time it is impossible to doubt—and it is thus I would venture briefly to express the conclusion to which we seem to be driven—that recent criticism of the Bible has given a severe shock to the foundations of the orthodox creed, and that as a consequence the minds of men will be forced more and more to fall back on the perennial sources of religious faith within themselves, and to seek the "seat of authority" where we have been long accustomed to place it, in the heart and conscience and reason of man.

THE REV. STOPFORD BROOKE AT LITTLE PORTLAND STREET CHAPEL.

On Sunday morning the first of the special services was held in Little Portland-street Chapel, at which for six months the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke is to be the preacher. The service was conducted by the Rev. H. S. Perris, minister of the chapel, and Mr. Brooke read the lessons. The Prayer-book was the "Ten Services" and the Hymn-book Mr. Brooke's "Christian Hymns," but there was no provision of these for visitors, so that fully a third of the large congregation which assembled appeared to be standing without books during the singing of the hymns, and were obliged to follow the service as best they could. Among the notices given out before the sermon was an announcement that both service and hymn-book could be purchased in the wardens' vestry, so that we may hope that in future the congregation will be better provided; but from the point of view of a public religious service such an arrangement cannot be regarded as admirable.

The Sermon.

The sermon was a powerful plea for faith in the Infinite and trust in the living God, the text being from Acts xvii. 27, 28, concluding with the words, "For in him we live and move and have our being."

After living with great Nature almost in solitude, Mr. Brooke said, it was a strange experience to return to London, that forge of human work and fashion. Things there regarded as of such importance seemed small. Man was walking in a vain show and disquieting himself in vain. The great things of Nature dwarfed the business and the battles in which men were so impetuously concerned. It was hard to regain a sense of proportion. Having lived in the real world one seemed called to take one's place in the unreal; having lived in peace, to return to disturbance. Yet our chief place in life, so long as we are not past work, is not with Nature, but with men and women. They need help and comfort, the suggestion of some joy, encouragement to seek some peace. And even if they regarded the life of great cities as one of the greatest mistakes man ever made, their duty lay there. They need have no part in the city's luxury, its foolish fashions, its desperate race for wealth. They need not share its noisy turmoils, but might live a quiet, unpretentious life of loving kindness, faith and hope. And from Nature they ought to be able to bring some thoughts to dignify and add beauty to their life with humanity.

For six weeks he had been in Cornwall, on the very verge of the Atlantic, where the dark cliffs break down from the grassy moors into the deep waters. All day long from the Lizard Point he had watched the ships pass by, an endless procession of every kind of vessel and of every nationality, and each with its own steadfast purpose. As he watched they had become to him a parable of the multitudinous ships of human life, each one upheld and guided on its way over the infinite ocean. And this thought came with overmastering force: "A mighty God is at the right hand of man, else long ago he had disappeared." It came with a voice as from the centre of truth, "Rest on that, for that is true."

Then he saw the ships of the nations of humanity, the nations of old, which for ages had sailed the ocean, but sunk at last. Yet their influence remained with the new nations—their influence for good and their great works, but not their evil. At the helm of the ship of humanity was God. Since He was Love they might be content and do their work, sure that whatever they could do would be taken up into His all-embracing force.

So they might learn to judge rightly of all the troubles and disasters of the world. They had to find out for themselves what was good. When man had learnt to obey the law of love, and not till then, would he cease to suffer. They were not saved from the consequences of ignorance and disobedience, but had to learn their own lessons, and in the process that wonderful thing Humanity was being, age by age, built up into its far-off perfection.

Yet God did not forget the individual in the whole. There was no final shipwreck for any man or woman. Their first thought of God might be as the Infinite of Power and Thought, but then as Infinite Love. In that they were at one with Christ, who gave to it its most perfect expression in the words, "Our Father." That thought must lie at the root of their life. They belonged to the Infinite, but as they realised it their own life would not be lost. Only that which was base and selfish in them would be destroyed; but none of the great issues of life would suffer loss, the noble causes, the high thinking and deep feeling, all that supported the enduring force of the human race, these would remain and be confirmed in the life of the Infinite.

ALDERMAN HARRY RAWSON, J.P.

PRESENTATION OF PORTRAIT.

At the Memorial Hall, Manchester, on Wednesday, October 8th, there was a gathering of Unitarians which will be long remembered by all those who were present. Its object was to do honour to Alderman Harry Rawson, by presenting his portrait to the trustees of the Memorial Hall, in which building it is to find a permanent home. The portrait has been painted by Sir George Reid, President of the Scotch Academy, and is a masterpiece of faithful and artistic delineation, while the cost of it has been met by subscriptions exclusively from his Unitarian friends and admirers in all parts of the United Kingdom.

Mr. F. Monks, chairman and treasurer of the "Harry Rawson Fund" Committee, presided, and there was a large and representative gathering of friends, including the Lord Mayor (Mr. Alderman Hoy), and a great many letters were received from friends unable to be present, full of expressions of gratitude for Mr. Rawson's many services, and of warm regard and friendship. We must be content to quote only from two of these:—

From the Principal and professors of Manchester College, Oxford, the following letter was received:—

The Bodleian celebration here makes it impossible for any of us to represent the College at the unveiling and presentation of the portrait of Alderman Harry Rawson. We do not wish, however, to be quite silent on such an occasion, but, at least in writing, would join heartily in every word of appreciation which may be addressed to him. We remember with admiration the long and honourable life which he has devoted so unselfishly to the public good; and especially we recall to mind the services which he has rendered to our College for so many years both as a member and as chairman of the Committee. We congratulate him on the recognition which he has won not only from a large circle of personal friends but from his fellow-citizens. Such men set an example of civic duty and ennoble our public life. Notwithstanding his great age, we hope he may still have some years before him in which, as strength may be given him, to add to our obligations or to enjoy a well-earned rest amid the respect and affection of his friends.

James Drummond, Charles B. Upton, J. Estlin Carpenter, J. Edwin Odgers, William Addis.

The Rev. H. Enfield Dowson wrote:—

We ministers, not in this province only but thoughout the United Kingdom, are bound to Mr. Rawson by a debt of gratitude beyond expression for what he has done for the ministry of our churches, and almost for each one of us individually. In the inmost circle of our lives we have had no truer or kinder friend, or one more wisely solicitous for our interests. With manifold business engagements, public and private, all punctually fulfilled with an efficiency as remarkable as the grace of manner in which every word has been spoken and every deed done, he yet always has had time and thought for us, not only in the support and guidance of institutions by which the ministry has been benefited, but in more personal services never to be forgotten by those to whom they have been rendered. And here he is amongst us to-day, in his unabated intellectual vigour, still full of the same activity, the example to us all, ministers and laymen, of a life of noble devotion of high gifts to the welfare of his brother men and to the advancement of "truth, liberty, and religion."

The Chairman, in his opening remarks, said that some years ago Mr. Rawson's friends asked him to sit for his portrait; but did not succeed in obtaining his consent. However, they pressed their request again recently, and were this time successful. Those who had subscribed considered it a privilege to be allowed to do so.

The Rev. S. A. Steinthal then read an Address beautifully written and bound in album form, to which were appended the facsimile signatures of all subscribers. It ran as follows:—

Dear Sir,—With grateful and affectionate respect we present our thanks to you for your consent to sit for your portrait, and allowing your likeness to be handed down to a posterity for which, while faithfully serving your contemporaries, you have done such enduring work.

There has been no institution connected with liberal Christian thought and Unitarian opinion the active usefulness of which has not been helped by your enlightened co-operation. You have zealously promoted the religious life and worship of the congregations of which you have been a member; for many years you have given your efficient aid to the colleges which train those who are to minister in things divine, and been a never-failing, sympathetic and successful helper in every effort to secure due respect and recognition for them in their sacred office.

To societies which are striving to diffuse spiritual and moral life, and to put their principles into practice, you have been a guide and leader; with business-like tact and skill directing their counsels and inspiring their action with graceful and persuasive eloquence.

Your conscientious devotion to religious principle has made you take an important part in many agencies which promoted moral reform and aimed to extend enlightened education in primary and secondary, as well as university, training; and, although successfully engaged in business life, in which your characteristic accuracy and grace have always been conspicuous, you have won the deserved respect of your fellow-citizens by the public spirit you have for well-nigh half a century shown in many municipal offices, bringing moral purity and high principle into their management. It is due to your retiring modesty alone that you have not held the position of the Chief Magistrate of your native city, which the unanimous vote of your colleagues offered to you.

It would not be easy to name all the offices you have filled, nor find fit words to describe the unobtrusive but efficient manner in which you have discharged each duty you have undertaken; nor can we tell how deep and warm is the affection which all who are privileged to enjoy your friendship cherish for your ever kind and courteous behaviour. We gratefully recognise the sympathy you at all times and under all circumstances have shown to all your friends.

We thank you for the opportunity you have at last given us of publicly though inadequately showing our gratitude for your many services, and our heartfelt personal regard for you. We pray that you may spend a prolonged and honoured old age, surrounded by the beloved members of your family and by many friends; and we are glad that you have allowed us to hand down to coming generations the picture of one who with his whole heart has loved both God and man, and has spent a long life in the faithful service of mankind.

Mr. Rawson, who was received with hearty cheers, replied as follows:—

Mr. Chairman and Friends,—I despair of offering any adequate expression of my gratitude for the honour you have done me, by your invitation that I would sit for this portrait. It came to me as a great surprise, and I accept it, and the address you have been good enough to present to me, as but too flattering an indication of your much-esteemed friendship and goodwill.

I suppose that the well-nigh eighty-two years that have passed since I was born have witnessed greater changes in theology, politics, and science, than any corresponding period since the beginning of authentic English history. Only seven years before 1820, it was a felony to deny the doctrine of the Trinity. Perhaps but too slowly moving down from "precedent to precedent," yet how wonderfully have our religious liberties been expanded! and the political franchise, also, has since been, in many directions, greatly enlarged.

In the case of theology the once burning questions are numerous indeed which have passed into obscurity, or retain but a feeble hold on modern thought. Perhaps the most momentous change which manifests itself in material modifications of the formularies of many denominations may be described as the transference of the conception of religion, as largely a system of creeds and confessions, to a belief in the supreme importance of conduct and character. But to this I can only allude. The extraordinary advances, of the last fifty years, in science and philosophy must be recognised by the least observing and reflecting minds.

My memory goes back to incidents so remote as the discussions between my father and his friends on Catholic Emancipation and the Coronation of William the Fourth. I well remember, too, the opening of the Liverpool and Manchester Railway—at that time an event of world-wide interest—the passing of the Reform Bill, and the Municipal Reform Act. On the foundation of the Anti-Corn-Law League, I was privileged to hear many of the speeches of Cobden and Bright in the first Free Trade Hall, as well as those of Paulton, Sir Perronet Thompson and W. J. Fox. Speaking of the poverty resulting from the taxes on corn (so unexpectedly renewed of late), the latter orator said that "it was caused by Peel and not Providence; was owing not to God but Government." Referring to outrages attendant on great distress in the agricultural districts, he remarked: "They are said to be burning the hayricks — they will soon attack the bishoprics!"

The struggle for the incorporation of Manchester was an interesting indication of the growing desire for self-government. It was a spirited effort, initiated by the local reformers who chafed under a control in which they had no share, and it was founded on the sound principle that "taxation without representation is unjust and indefensible." I didn't then imagine that I should subsequently have the privilege of taking some part, through a long course of years, in the government of my native city. The Council, when I began, in 1856, my first period of connection with it, was composed of sixty-four representatives—it now numbers 104. That its proceedings have occasionally been open to adverse criticism may be admitted, for it is composed of human, and therefore fallible elements. But it has served the city with ability, zeal, enterprise, and no little self-sacrifice. It has held a high estimate of the work of a municipality in promoting the health, the comfort, the culture, and the innocent recreation of the community. In the department of Free Libraries it holds a front place for the extent and success of its operations. To send out to the homes of the people over a million volumes a day cannot but be a generous contribution to their mental and moral improvement. In the direction of Technical Instruction, now universally admitted to be of prime national importance, it has been a privilege to take some share. This educational part of my municipal life has always presented to me the chiefest attraction. But when, a few years ago, a special emergency arose in the department of police, I willingly engaged with other members in an energetic effort to purify and restore its efficiency; for I had long been convinced that a well-ordered and well-directed constabulary might be made an important factor in the promotion of public morality.

My experience leads me to think that an energetic Municipal Council comes, possibly, into closer touch with the health, convenience, and happiness of a community than many of the labours of Parliament. A diligent member may soon recognise his influence on questions which interest him, and he may have the pleasure of seeing "something attempted, something done," whenever he meets his colleagues.

Turning now to another line of humble service, it has been an unceasing pleasure to participate in labours for the spread of a religious faith, at once reverent and reasonable. I owe an ever-during debt of gratitude to the teachings and the influence of the Rev. John James Tayler, Especially was I impressed by him with the conviction that "the truth never yet did harm to any man," or as Chaucer puts it, "and trouthe thee shall deliver, 'tis no drede." Mr. Tayler taught that no sect enjoys a monopoly of truth, because it is many-sided; and that under divergent forms, a religious spirit may be cultivated and maintained. And this admirable counsel was enforced and illustrated by the saintly example of the preacher, of whom also it may be said that he "allured to brighter worlds and led the way."

A long life's observation has verified to me the fundamental duty of keeping an open mind, and of giving a fair hearing to views however opposed to one's own. I have found it quite compatible with all this to entertain and hold fast the definite opinions I have formed. Whilst never obtruding my Unitarianism on others, I have never shrunk from its avowal. Nor have I ever had reason to regret this course. It has been my good fortune to work with men of every kind of religious convictions, and with some who didn't care to acknowledge any. But some share of influence has, nevertheless, fallen to me, and ample toleration for my unpopular beliefs.

I have gratefully referred to the assistance I received in my early days in the formation of my religious views, and the principles on which they could be most securely based.

To the Rev. Dr. Beard I was also subsequently deeply indebted, and by his teaching and example was permanently influenced. My special obligation to him was that he inspired me with a desire to return to society some service for the advantages it confers in a thousand ways. His was a mind sagacious, enterprising, and stimulating, in a high degree. Long before the duties of citizenship became a prominent topic, he expounded and enforced them both from the pulpit and the press. It may reasonably be attributed in some measure to his teaching, that in the congregation he founded and faithfully served so many years, there were, at different times, three Mayors of the city and three Councillors. To his fertile mind we owe the establishment both of the Unitarian Home Missionary Board (for which the word College was substituted, with, perhaps, doubtful advantage) and the Memorial Hall, in which it afterwards found a suitable and permanent home. For some time it met in the upper room of a warehouse, with but limited and unsatisfactory accommodation. One remembers Mr. Gaskell's characteristic comment—"he was well satisfied with the board, but thought the lodgings might be improved."

Perhaps I may be allowed to say that I have always felt an interest in our periodicals—particularly in "The Inquirer," and that I entertain a high opinion of the services it has rendered to liberal views of theology and religion. Its successive editors, often under scant encouragement, have conducted it with ability, learning and zeal, and at no small personal self-sacrifice. It is now undergoing some changes, which I earnestly hope may secure for it a wider support and an extended influence. And I have regarded it as an advantage that the Christian Life should reach a large circle of readers, to whom, perhaps, its distinctively denominational tone renders it more acceptable.

Great changes have taken place since my earlier days in the number of churches and chapels in the centre of this city. I can recall the names and positions of not fewer than seventeen. Some of them have been transformed into Mission Halls—which, however, are doing a large amount of religious and benevolent work—and the congregations of several have sold their property and raised new buildings in the suburbs. Our venerable Cross-street Chapel, as the first Nonconformist place of worship in Manchester, is now about the last. These removals may or may not affect the sum total of worshippers. But I presume we are all painfully apprehensive of a decline in their number—a decline which suggests serious considerations. In a recent course of parochial visitations, the Bishop of Manchester has earnestly dealt with the question, and invited discussion upon it. Is the decline owing to the increase of out-door pleasures on the Sunday; to an impaired conception of its rightful uses; to a growing indifference to the weightiest of subjects; to defects in the administration of religious observances—to sermons which fail to command interest, or are too long for modern powers of sustained attention? On this latter supposition the Bishop has addressed many shrewd observations to his clergy: "Let them make the House of God more homelike; have shorter and brighter sermons; let them prepare their sermons more carefully, construct them more logically, and deliver them more distinctly and heartily." In any case there is ample food for thought on these points by all, of any creed or school, who are concerned for the vital interests of public worship.

It has been one of the greatest satisfactions of my life to sustain relations of friendship and confidence with many of the ministers of our group of churches. I know no class of men for whom my esteem and affection have been more deeply and constantly engaged, nor with whom I have enjoyed opportunities of intercourse more highly valued. For their ability, their learning, their devotion to their sacred calling, the spirit with which they bear their generally inadequate pecuniary acknowledgments, I entertain the sincerest admiration. Anything that concerned their professional training, their influence, personal well-being and success, has ever been to me of abiding interest.

We have great reason for congratulation on the brilliant success which has attended the scheme of a Ministerial Pension Fund. For its inception we are much indebted to Mr. Cogan Conway and other friends. For the ability, zeal and labour expended on the canvass for pecuniary support, we can never adequately express our acknowledgments to the Rev. J. E. Carpenter. This provision for old age and infirmity forms a graceful and fitting sequel to the two funds in aid of ministers' stipends, established in Liverpool, the Augmentation Fund founded by the late Mr. Rawdon in 1856, and the Sustentation Fund projected in 1882. That by these means material aid is now supplied to many good men who are giving their lives in the cause of religion, often on very meagre resources, cannot but be to us all a source of sincere satisfaction. But, like so many other valuable measures, these institutions have their dangers, against which the managers should ever be on their guard. The grants they make will be of true service only so long as 1st, they are not regarded as eleemosynary gifts, and so are compatible with the self-respect of their recipients; and 2nd, as they effectually remind congregations of their individual duty to their ministers, and induce them to perform it. If the Funds lead to the idea that the provision thus made relieves them, to the slightest extent, from their personal obligations, and to reckon the grants as part of the stipends, instead of merely additions to them, they will be, to that extent, misunderstood and misapplied. We have reason to know that the liberality of several congregations has, in many cases, been stimulated to additional generosity. But the price of a perfect administration is unceasing vigilance.

And now, dear friends, it is time to close these discursive remarks. I know not how fittingly to reward your kindness and confidence by further contributions to labours in which we have a common interest. I feel that my work, such as it is, is nearly done—that I must now "shake off some cares and business from my age, conferring them on younger strengths."

I would gladly renew my heartfelt thanks to all who have so kindly, so generously, and with so much delicate consideration, begun and carried through this compliment—so much in excess of my deserts. It is the culmination of acknowledgments that have never failed to quicken my regrets for opportunities of service neglected, partially used or misapplied, and of these your very kindness renders me more painfully conscious.

It would remain to me a constant reproach if I failed to express my obligations to the distinguished artist who kindly undertook your commission. Sir George Reid not only occupies a prominent place in the front rank of his profession, but is a man of many and varied accomplishments. For his patience, kindness and courtesy I shall ever be grateful, and I deem it a high privilege to have made his acquaintance.

The Chairman formally presented the portrait to the Trustees of the Memorial Hall, and Mr. George S. Woolley, their treasurer, accepted it on their behalf.

Mr. William Long next presented a framed photograph of the portrait to Mrs. Rawson.

After a vote of thanks to the Chairman, moved by Mr. Rawson and seconded by Mr. J. R. Beard, tea and coffee were served, and a full hour was spent in friendly social intercourse.

The portrait is now on view in the City Art Gallery, Mosley-street, where it will remain for the present.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Harvest Thanksgiving Services.

Our note of last week as to decorations, special music, and large congregations must be repeated.

Aberdare: Highland-place.—Preacher, the Rev. J. T. Davis, of Cardiff, maintaining the principle of vegetarianism.

Cwmbach (Oct. 5 and 6).—Services conducted by the Rev. D. Evans. Preachers, the Revs. H. F. Short, J. H. Davies, J.P., and W. James, J.P.

London: Islington.—Preacher, the Rev. Dr. G. Dawes Hicks. Offerings of fruit, &c., taken to Winifred House and the North London Nursing Home.

London: Kentish Town.—Preacher, the Rev. G. Critchley. A congregational soirée is to be held on the 23rd inst. to welcome Mr. Critchley as minister of the church.

Manchester: Pendleton.—Preacher, the Rev. S. A. Steinthal. On Monday the Literary and Debating Society held its first meeting for the season, when the President, Mr. J. Wigley, gave an address on "Happiness: How to Secure It," followed by a debate.

Merthyr: Twynrodyn Chapel.—Preacher, the Rev. D. J. Williams.

Swansea (Oct. 5).—Preacher, the Rev. W. Tudor Jones. On Thursday week the first of the winter social evenings was successfully held. On Sunday evening Mr. Jones preached on the Education Bill to a large congregation.

Warwick.—Preacher, the Rev. J. Howard, of Tamworth.

Acton.—The Rev. J. H. Wicksteed, M.A., commenced his work in London as minister-at-large of the London District Unitarian Society on Sunday, the 5th inst., by conducting the services lately started in the Central Auction Mart. There was a very encouraging attendance, and his address on "Unitarians and their Gospel" was much appreciated. The same subject was dealt with on Sunday last, when there was an attendance of nearly fifty people. Next Sunday the Rev. H. W. Perris commences a series of sermons on "Religion and Business;" to be followed by the Rev. J. H. Wicksteed on "Religion and Pleasure" and "Religion and Art," and concluded by the Rev. J. E. Stronge on "Religion and Nature." Any friends residing in the neighbourhood are earnestly requested to come and help.

Chowbent.—The guild here reopened its regular meetings on Monday evening with a large attendance of members and friends, when, after some arrangements of the winter's work, a paper was read by Mr. George Critchley, one of the four teachers who had been sent by this school to the Oxford meetings. The paper proved both interesting and valuable to teachers especially, conveying as it did some of the spirit and the lessons of the Oxford Summer School, and is to be followed by papers from the other three teachers at subsequent meetings. On alternate Sunday afternoons the Rev. J. J. Wright is giving to the united classes of young men and young women in the school a summary of the five papers read at the Whit-week meetings on "Types of Religious Experience." The third paper, "From Methodism to Unitarianism," is announced for Sunday next. The young people appear to be following them with great relish and profit.

Ipswich.—A social gathering to inaugurate the winter session of the Friars-street Social Guild was held on Tuesday, Oct. 7, in the schoolroom adjoining the Old Meeting House. The walls were adorned for the occasion with an interesting collection of paintings and sketches, including a number of the landscapes of John Moore, and copies of several of the masterpieces of G. F. Watts, R.A., executed in oils by the Rev. L. Tavener; but the principal interest in the collection centred in the display of work done by the members of the minister's "painting class," held during the previous winter. Most of the members of this class had no previous training in painting in oils, but Mr. Tavener's enthusiasm succeeded in producing at their hands a number of wonderfully truthful copies of such pictures as Luke Fildes' "The Doctor," Abbey's "Music the Food of Love," and "Cherry Ripe," besides a few landscapes. All who were present were surprised and delighted with this result of a winter's work, and warmly congratulated Mr. Tavener and the students. An exceedingly pleasant evening was spent, and plans for the coming session were discussed. Several lantern lectures are already arranged for, and the guild will include all the social elements of the church work. Nearly seventy members were enrolled on this evening, so that there is every prospect of a good winter session.

London: Plumstead.—The occasion of the London Unitarian Ministers' Meeting at Plumstead on Monday afternoon was taken to arrange a public meeting in the church in the evening, at which addresses were given in illustration of the Unitarian position. The chair was taken by the Rev. James Harwood, President of the Ministers' Meeting, and addresses were given by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, on "The Bible"; the Rev. J. H. Wicksteed, on "Jesus Christ"; and the Rev. V. D. Davis, on "The Church." Hymns were sung at the opening and close of the meeting, which was well attended.

Manchester District Association.—The monthly meeting, under the scheme of extended usefulness, was held at Oldham on Saturday, Oct. 4. In the afternoon a Conference was held in the church, under the chairmanship of Mr. Kenworthy, when the Rev. Charles Roper, President of the Association, read a paper on "What is Congregational Success?" which was followed by an interesting discussion. In the evening a public meeting was held in the school, and was presided over by Mr. A. E. Paterson, a vice-president of the Association. Speeches were delivered by the Chairman, the Rev. Charles Peach, Mr. F. Hepworth, and Mr. T. F. Robinson (lay-secretary of the Association). The proceedings were enthusiastic, and felt to be helpful by those present. The Oldham-road Church, Manchester, will be the next place visited by the Association, on Saturday, Nov. 1.

Manchester: Platt Chapel.—A successful Sale of Work was held on Friday and Saturday week to clear off the chapel debt and provide new heating apparatus. Mr. George Leigh opened the sale, with the Rev. C. Roper in the chair; and on Saturday Mrs. Enfield Dowson, in her husband's absence, the chairman being Mr. D. A. Little.

Manchester Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The annual meeting was held in the Memorial Hall, Manchester, on Saturday, Oct. 11, under the chairmanship of the President, Mr. T. F. Robinson. The adoption of the fifty-second annual report was moved by the Chairman, who said that the work of the past year had been highly interesting and helpful. The average attendance at the Sunday afternoon conferences had been somewhat smaller than in the previous year; but the papers had been excellent. The treasurer's accounts showed a small balance in hand. He hoped that the Manchester schools would generously help the District Sunday School Association to make the bazaar, which is to be held next spring, a success, in order that the Holiday Home at Hucklow and the Red Cross Convalescent Home at Blackpool might be firmly established. He also spoke of the Education question and the increasing responsibilities falling upon Sunday-schools. Mrs. Manning, of Sheffield, delivered a most impressive address on "How can we make Moral and Religious Instruction Interesting to a Child?" It held the audience spell-bound, and will be long remembered as an inspiring appeal to teachers and parents to bring their highest powers to bear upon the training of the young. Messrs. Woodhead and Golland were reappointed treasurer and secretary respectively, and the Rev. Charles Roper was elected President for the ensuing year. During the evening the Pendleton choir provided both vocal and instrumental items of music.

Preston.—On Tuesday week the winter session of the Band of Hope in connection with the Percy-street School was opened with a children's "At Home," when the youngsters entertained their seniors to a capital programme, and afterwards supplied them with refreshments. Subsequently the time was spent in games and dancing. The Rev. N. Anderton presided, and delivered a short appropriate address.

Southern Unitarian Association.—The quarterly meeting of the executive was held at Emerson Hall, Parkstone, on Wednesday week. At the business meeting in the afternoon, Mr. J. Cogan Conway (President) was in the chair. The proposed mission to be conducted by the Rev. Edgar Daplyn, at Poole, in November, was the chief topic of discussion, and several of the details with regard to the services were finally settled and approved. At the conclusion of the business a short paper was read by the Rev. Alfred Hood on "The Permanent Elements in Christianity," which he defined as the sense of brotherhood, based on faith and controlled by love. That was the source of its power over the hearts and lives of men. An animated discussion followed. In the evening a well-attended public meeting was held, at which the Mayor of Poole (Mr. Charles Carter, C.C.) took the chair, and in opening the proceedings expressed his feeling that Unitarians, in common with other Christians, needed to grapple more firmly with questions of every-day interest and practical helpfulness, and less with matters of purely theological interest. The Rev. E. C. Bennett spoke on "Christian Consciousness," and on the urgent need there was to-day for the realisation of that personal contact with Christ which formed the very secret of Christian strength from the days of the apostles down to now. Mr. Cogan Conway, as President of the Association, addressed the meeting on "The Faith of a Unitarian," and Mr. W. T. Bushrod spoke on "The Duty of our Churches towards Temperance," pleading strongly for total abstinence as alone consistent with the self-sacrifice for others' good, which was the sum and substance of the religion of Christ. After short addresses by the Revs. C. E. Pike and T. R. Skemp, a resolution condemnatory of the Education Bill was moved by Mr. H. Blessley, seconded by Mr. Bushrod, and carried, with only three or four dissentients, who voted for an amendment moved by Mr. Conway and seconded by the Rev. C. E. Pike.

UNITY CHURCH, UPPER STREET, ISLINGTON.

Rev. STOPFORD A. BROOKE, LL.D., will preach at Unity Church next SUNDAY EVENING, October 19th, on behalf of the North London Nursing Association.

Service commences at 7 o'clock.

MARRIAGES.

Rowland—Thomas—On the 9th October, at St. Mary Magdalene, Addiscombe, by the Rev. H. T. L. Walker, assisted by the Rev. H. Glover (Vicar), George James, youngest son of the late William Henry Rowland, J.P., Solicitor, Croydon, to Emma Kathleen, second daughter of H. Felix Thomas, of "Ulimbah," Ashburton-road, Croydon.

Yorkshire Training School of Physical Culture.

The above School was opened more than two years ago with the object of providing a centre in the North of England for the professional training of educated women in the Swedish system of Physical Culture.

The minimum cost is of two years' duration, and includes the Study of Physiology, Anatomy, Hygiene, Chemistry, Elementary Pathology, Theory of Movements, Practical Subjects, as Gymnastics, Fencing, Swimming, Games, &c.

That such a centre is needed seems to be proved by the fact that the first student trained by this School was, on the completion of her course, appointed under the Bradford Board as Instructress on Physical Culture to their schools.

THE SOUTH SHORE UNITARIAN CHURCH, BLACKPOOL,

has purchased, at a cost of nearly £600, a plot of freehold land, and they now appeal for help to erect a plain, substantial building to serve for all purposes. It is hoped to be able to do this for £1,500, making a total cost of £2,100. The land, thanks to the generosity of Mrs. John Grundy, of Summerseat; Miss S. Scholes Wrigley, of Windermere (on her own and her late mother's behalf), and Mr. R. T. Heape, of Rochdale, is entirely paid for. The Congregation have themselves promised over £300 towards the erection of the building. They carry on the Services and the Sunday School without any grant, and they feel that the remarkable success of their efforts justifies them in asking friends to help them to carry on their work under more favourable circumstances than at present. Their appeal has the full approval of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, the North and East Lancashire Mission, and the North Lancashire and Westmorland Unitarian Association; and the B. and F. U. A. has promised £25 to the Building Fund.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

MR. STOPFORD BROOKE'S article on "The Vision of Christ in Browning's 'Christmas-Eve'" will be found on p. 675.

LONDON streets are loyal in their decorations, and this Saturday is ordered as a Bank Holiday in the City, that the King and Queen may make a Royal progress, and receive an address, and lunch at the Guildhall. This is for the completion of the Coronation celebrations. May the sun shine for the enjoyment of the King and Queen, and their people!

OUR London friends have no doubt already made a note of the important meeting announced by the London District Unitarian Society for Tuesday evening next. It follows the meeting of the Council of the B. and F.U.A., after a tea and reception by the President of the Society (Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence) and Lady Durning-Lawrence at seven. The country members of the Council who can arrange to remain may be assured of a cordial welcome, and their presence, as well as that of as many London friends as possible, will be gratifying and helpful to all who are immediately engaged in the work.

THE annual meeting of the Lancashire and Cheshire Society for the Permanent Care of the Feeble-minded was held at the Manchester Town Hall on Tuesday, the Lord Mayor in the chair. The report, which was read by Miss Mary Dendy, stated that the two schools at Sandbridge had been happily started, and had now fourteen boys and nine girls in residence, and the children were delighted with their new surroundings. The scheme, however, must be completed by the creation of the adult schools, to receive scholars at the age of sixteen, and very soon more accommodation for younger children would be required, so that there was urgent need of more funds. Land they had, thanks to the Lewis Trustees, and only lack of means prevented them from building at once. The present schools are to be publicly opened next month by the Hon. Mrs. M'Lagan.

LORD ROSEBERY made another emphatic utterance on Thursday, last week, on the subject of the Education Bill. Having unexpectedly attended a meeting at the City Liberal Club, he strongly supported a resolution in favour of "efficient, free, and unsectarian education in schools maintained at the public expense, and managed by the directly elected representatives of the people." In the course of his remarks he declared his satisfaction with the proposal to add to the effective power of the county and urban authorities—we suppose no thinking man feels otherwise—but opposed the policy of abolishing the great School Boards, whose work has been invaluable. As to the proposal to leave a large number of schools to be managed by a "close corporation," in which the ratepayers should only be represented by a third of the managers, he expressed a doubt whether, even now, it would be enacted by law; but, if so, it must be resisted to the death. He recognised the claim of the owners of the fabrics of the denominational schools, but he "would rather buy out the schools" than hand over the nation's liberties in the manner proposed. His own sympathy went with Sir Edward Grey's proposal—namely, to permit the denominational authorities to appoint one-third of the managers; to give one-third to the parochial authority; and to throw open the remaining third to appointment by direct parish vote. But Lord Rosebery's final word was one of stern opposition to the Bill as a whole, expectation of getting it amended in a Liberal sense, should it become law, being hopeless in face of the "impregnable barrier" of the House of Lords.

POPULAR demonstrations in opposition to the Bill continue to be made. As examples, we may record those at Rochdale and the Spen Valley (West Riding) on Saturday; at Leicester on Monday; a Free Church manifestation at the Metropolitan Tabernacle on Tuesday; and, on the same evening, a mass meeting of over six thousand persons at the East End (Mile End-road). The Rochdale meeting against the Bill was preceded by one in its favour, but the latter was quite eclipsed. It is estimated that twenty thousand persons attended the opposition meeting. The West Riding meeting was characteristically thorough in its denunciation of the Bill; and the Leicester opposition was not a whit less determined. On Tuesday the great Tabernacle was the scene of a very enthusiastic demonstration, the defiant tones of Dr. Guinness Rogers being cheered to the echo. Alderman Dickinson, speaking as an Anglican, said that religious freedom was in danger, and the Church itself would lose rather than gain if the present Bill were passed. It may be noted that the enrolment of "no rate" objectors is going on vigorously in certain districts; cards inviting signatures of objectors have been issued by the National Free Church Council.

CLAUSE 8 of the Education Bill, on which, since the assembling of Parliament, the Committee has been engaged, makes, as was to be expected, very slow progress. The clause as submitted runs as follows:

8.—(1.) The local educational authority shall maintain and keep efficient all public elementary schools within their area which are necessary, subject, in the case of a school not provided by them, to the following conditions:—

(a) The managers of the school shall carry out any directions of the local education authority as to the secular instruction to be given in the school.

(b) The local education authority shall have power to inspect the school, and the accounts of the managers shall be subject to audit by that authority.

(c) The consent of the local education authority shall be required to the appointment of teachers, but that consent shall not be withheld except on educational grounds.

(d) The managers of the school shall, out of funds provided by them, keep the school-house in good repair, and make such alterations and improvements in the buildings as may be reasonably required by the local education authority.

(e) The local education authority shall have the right of appointing such persons as they think fit to be additional managers, so that the number of the persons so appointed, if more than one, does not exceed one-third of the whole number of managers.

(2.) If any question arises under this section between the local education authority and the managers of a school, that question shall be determined by the Board of Education, and compliance with this section shall be one of the conditions required to be fulfilled by an elementary school in order to obtain a Parliamentary grant.

(3) The grant under the Voluntary Schools Act, 1897, in respect of any schools maintained by a local education authority, shall, instead of being distributed by the Board of Education, be paid by that Board to that authority, and shall be applied by the authority in aid of the expenses incurred by them under this part of this Act.

Up to the time of writing (Thursday) the following lines have been passed, with amendment, as will be seen, and not without resort to the closure.

Clause 8.—(1) The local education authority shall maintain and keep efficient all public elementary schools within their area which are necessary, and have the control of all expenditure required for that purpose, other than expenditure for which under this Act provision is to be made by the managers, so long as in the case of a school not provided by them, the following conditions and provisions are complied with:—

(a) The managers of the school shall carry out any directions of the local education authority as to the secular instruction to be given in the school.

A large number of amendments have been either ruled out or defeated, among the latter being one or two designed to give to the local authority an option in taking over the denominational schools, and, in particular, to insist on the buildings being suitable before taking them over.

The "religious difficulty" was the subject of an interesting, and on the whole useful, debate on Tuesday, a proposal being made to enact that "(a) The school shall open and close with religious worship; (b) Religious instruction, based upon the reading of the Bible, shall form part of the regular instruction in the school." This was opposed by leaders on both sides, for different reasons, and the amendment was ultimately withdrawn. Later in the sitting Mr. Balfour indicated his consent to extending the powers of the "local authority" (i.e., the local Council) so as to include the choice of text-books. Sir William Anson, the new Education Secretary, has also given notice of an amendment on the part of the Government permitting the "local authority" to hold examinations to determine the merits of candidate pupil-teachers. These are, however, but feeble signs of grace. Unless the local authority has power to appoint the head-teachers and assistants, their "control" is, to say the least, extremely incomplete and unsatisfactory.

The following extract from a letter written by Councillor Titterton, of Birmingham, to the secretary of a Free Church Council indicates the spirit—in our opinion an admirable one—that animates the Birmingham protest:—

To my mind, we have arrived at a crisis in national political righteousness, a period when diplomatic expediency and political exigency cannot rule the situation. To me and to such as I, who have been loyal supporters of the Government, the position is painful and not without perplexity and complexity; but I cannot but feel that a true perception of that righteousness which becomes a nation compels us to offer the most strenuous opposition to proposals which, whatever merits they contain—and there are merits, and great merits, in the Bill—also involve a grave attack on prime constitutional principles and upon religious freedom and equality. These things must be maintained, even though through chaos we have to secure them.

The new building of St. Deiniol's Library at Hawarden, opened by Earl Spencer on Tuesday week, replaces the iron structure in which Mr. Gladstone, during his lifetime, deposited with his own hands more than 30,000 of his books, to form the nucleus of a library for the use of students, devoted to "the advancement of Divine learning." He also provided a house, for the residence of those who came from a distance to use the library. During the past eight years nearly 600 readers have been received at this hostel for periods varying from a few days to months, the expense of board and lodging being 25s. a week. The National Memorial Committee contributed £10,000 for the erection of the permanent Library, which is a fine stone building, Domestic Gothic in style. There are two large rooms, one 30 ft. by 45 ft., the other 30 ft. by 28 ft., and several studies for the use of readers. In the front of the building a granite stone bears this inscription:—

In this building, erected to his memory by a grateful nation, is preserved the library of William Ewart Gladstone, who, eminent no less as theologian than as statesman, established this foundation for the advancement of Divine learning. This stone was laid in the presence of the Lord Bishop of the diocese by the Duke of Westminster, K.G., October 5, 1899. G. C. Joyce, Warden.

At the opening ceremony Earl Spencer spoke with much feeling of Mr. Gladstone, as a great statesman, and one who had set a noble example to his country and to the world. The Rev. Stephen Gladstone accepted the gift on behalf of the Trustees and Warden, and Mr. Andrew Carnegie, Viscount Peel, and Dr. Guinness Rogers also spoke.

The Brandlehow Estate, of 108 acres of meadow and woodland on the south-western shore of Derwentwater, acquired last year for £6,500, by the National Trust, was opened on Thursday week by Princess Louise, "for the enjoyment of the public, under the keeping and direction of the National Trust." To Canon Rawnsley and Miss Octavia Hill are chiefly due the success of the public appeal, which secured the funds for this purchase from some 1,300 persons, many of them being working men and women from North-country towns. In an album of photographs of Derwentwater presented to the Princess was a sonnet by Canon Rawnsley, of which the following are the concluding lines:—

And here may mortals weary of the strife
Of inconsiderate cities hope to come
And learn the fair tranquillities of earth.
Here men may pray, here poet thoughts have birth;
Here all shy forest creatures find a home,
And wildwood pleasaunce help a nation's life.

The Princess was welcomed as vice-president of the National Trust, in an address which contained the following passage:—

We rejoice to think that your visit should be associated with the preservation to the nation of these woods and meadows on the shores of one of the most beautiful lakes of the Lake country. Such a preservation is without precedent; but we trust that the kindness and public spirit of your Royal Highness in coming amongst us and declaring this land to be national property will cause the action of the National Trust to be an encouragement to others for many acts of a similar character.

In the London Quarterly Review an interesting attempt is made by the Rev. J. H. Leckie to show that the main doctrine laid down in the first sections of Martineau's "Seat of Authority" does not involve the negations of Dr. Martineau and his school. It is pointed out that Dr. Martineau himself does not claim that the individual whose final authority is within is absolved from the duty of heeding external testimony. On the other hand, no Protestant theology teaches that a man must accept the voice of the Church or of the Scriptures as if they were police regulations without reference to his own heart and conscience. "The tribunal of the soul has inalienable rights, and mere formal assent, without inner conviction, is wanting in all religious value." It is suggested, therefore, that there is no contradiction between the teaching which places the seat of authority in the conscience, and the theologies which claim authority for the Scriptures, for the Church, and for Jesus Christ. Dante could not appeal to us if we were not akin to Dante, but we cannot evolve from our own consciousness critical canons by which to judge Dante. Great spirits lay their authority upon us. "They judge us; them we do not judge." Hence it is contended that the lordship of Jesus Christ may be recognised by the conscience as complete. The collective witness of the saints of the Church to their attitude of dependence upon him is a witness that we are bound to note. The prophetic function being admitted to be indispensable, it being necessary for the spiritually strong to aid the weak, the spiritually clear-sighted to come to the assistance of those whose vision is less perfect, why may not Jesus possess that perfect confidence which, in imperfect degree, we render to the individual saints of the Church, to the prophets, to God's great men whenever we meet them? The paper is exceedingly suggestive as an attempt to find a way out of a purely dogmatic difficulty. Were there no imposed dogma such a difficulty could not arise, for we can very well imagine one ascending from degree to degree in enthusiastic trust of Christ, till he should decide that whenever his soul and Christ's word seemed to be at variance it must be that he had not rightly caught the Master's meaning. Christ's lordship would in that case be complete. Yet the disciple need never at any moment have felt any lessening of his own responsibility, or any loss to his individuality in the process. The difficulty is that men, in Dr. Watts's phrase, "conspire" to exalt Christ, instead of leaving the soul to discover freely his wondrous spiritual authority.

In the same number Professor W. T. Davidson reviews very favourably and sympathetically Fairbairn's "Philosophy of the Christian Religion," finding fault, however, with the author's total rejection of a mercantile doctrine of Atonement, and indicating other differences. Another writer, Alexander Brown, M.A., labours perseveringly with the story of Adam's Fall in Genesis, setting aside the identification of the serpent with Satan, and very freely interpreting the entire "pictograph," but in the end has to confess that, rationalise the story as we may, it never can consist with the doctrine of evolution which demands a "fall upward," such as by no ingenuity can be wrested from this story.

THE VISION OF CHRIST IN BROWNING'S "CHRISTMAS-EVE."

One of the most imaginative of Browning's conceptions is that of the appearance of Christ in "Christmas-Eve." He has been caught by the rain on the edge of the wild common and taken refuge in a little chapel, just where the common ends and the squalid alleys of the town begin. The wretched folk, the dingy chapel, the settled, inquisitive intolerance of the congregation and their minister, the "immense stupidity" and sordidness of it all, are painted with a half-pity, a half-contempt, a vividness of observation and a humour touched with human charity. But beneath the rough and careless humour the sense of the worth of religion, even in these strange clothes, emerges from the whole description, and dignifies the little chapel, its people, its minister, and its surroundings. It is a piece of pure genius to make this serious impression emerge from the fantastic humour of the description. But, at last, Browning can stand it no longer, and he flings out of the chapel into the open air. And there he was face to face with the solemn, lonely, silent sky.

> There was a lull in the rain, a lull
> In the wind too; the moon was risen,
> And would have shone out pure and full,
> But for the ramparted cloud-prison
> Block on block built up in the west,
> For what purpose the wind knows best,
> Who changes his mind continually.

"How pure and different," he thinks, is this outside from that inside! And, while for a moment he muses on the strange means, such as he has seen, by which faith is confirmed in those who already believe—the rush of the wind and rain through the boundless sky awakens the faith of his youth, when, looking at the great skies, he realised the power of God; and at the same moment felt in his heart that the power was co-ordinate with Love, must itself be Love. Nay, Love was the first, the only thing; the root of the universe. Love was seen through power, and the power wrought what love desired. "This was the vision of my youth. I knew that God taught me more and more of the love He had given me; and teaching it and giving it, would never let it perish. Spite of decay, spite of death, love would arise into perfectness.

> And I shall behold Thee, face to face,
> O God, and in Thy light retrace
> How in all I loved here, still wast Thou.

And, then, through endless life, Thou wilt satiate, quicken, sublimate the love thou hast begun in me. That early faith is mine now, as, escaped from the chapel's narrow shrine, I walk free and uplifted under this wide and stormy sky!"

This is a real piece of biography. Browning in this poem is not always speaking directly from himself, but as the voice of others whom he represents; but in this record, he, to our great interest, reveals what his youth felt, his youth conceived; and it accords with a number of passages in "Paracelsus," and other poems.

But, upborne by pride in this large conception of God, he has fallen into despising the narrow ways of those poor folk who with all their ugly foolishness are yet the friends of Christ, because they love him. Therefore, in this hour of spiritual exaltation, he sees the Vision of the Lord, and in the Vision knows that he has erred. And Browning, with his usual care to make the scenery fit the revelation and to awaken expectation into exaltation, opens the heavens into splendour. The moon appears in the full, unclouded expanse of the zenith, and round her a rainbow, and beyond that another rainbow,

> Fainter, flushier, and flightier,—
> Rapture dying along its verge!

Whom shall he see? for this is but the prelude of an advent to the soul. And in a moment, even while he thought only of himself, of the glory revealed to him alone—

> All at once I looked up in terror.
> He was there.
> He Himself with his human air,
> On the narrow pathway, just before:
> I saw the back of Him, no more—
> He has left the chapel, then, as I.
> I forgot all about the sky.
> No face: only the sight
> Of a sweepy Garment, vast and white,
> With a hem that I could recognise.

And, remembering that Jesus had said he would be in the midst of two or three who met to pray, he feared; because he had despised the friends of Christ in the chapel. Yet he appeals: "O recall the amends my heart made before I saw thee. Thou art the Love of God—did I not place Love above Power? Folly and pride overcame me. I thought men ought to worship thee in beauty, not in uncouth forms. I knew not what I pitied. But thou who curest sin, thou wilt love me, for I have only desired love—leave me not. I offer all my heart to thee." Then the face of the Vision was turned to him, and like John in Patmos he fell prostrate, "saturate with brightness"; and swept up into, and clinging to, the hem of the Vesture, he is carried away across the world; dispensed, because he loves, from seeking any of the various ways which others adopt to reach the vision of God. He has his own hold on the Garment.

And he finds himself outside St. Peter's, while within, High Mass is being celebrated. Christ enters, for here love is worshipped; but he, allowed to worship in his own way (for he is allowed to hold the garment still), remains without, thinking. "I see the error of Rome, but above the scope of error, I see the love—the love of those first Christian days which—being the new, the startling, the all-sufficient thing—conquered the poetry, rhetoric, philosophy and art of the ancient world, and made new forms of them, and offered all the forms to God. Love, even accompanied by the intolerance and errors of Rome, was the conqueror and regenerator of the ancient world. There cannot be too much love. That is the greatest truth. But my intellect desires its share; needs also satisfaction. It were well that what I worship should be reasoned on as well as loved, that the figure the work of love has made should be completed by the work of intellect."

And no sooner had he thought this than he was swept in the Garment's fold out into the storm and night again, and found himself, still holding to the Vesture's hem, outside a lecture-room, it may be at Göttingen, and listening to a discourse on the myth of the birth of Christ, and on the history of his teaching; and the result of the lecture is that when all the foreign matter is strained away, the residuum is a "man whom you may continue to adore more than all who went before or followed him. Venerate the Myth; it contains your faith. Reasoning has reduced the Pearl of price to dust; all the same the Pearl is there."

Let this be counted, Browning thinks, for righteousness to the critic. The love in his soul has felt the infinite mastery of love in the story. His conclusion is beyond his argument. Moreover, we may honour his learning. Thus the dreamer argues, because he must explain to himself why Christ, as if he had friends there, had entered the lecture-room. And while he thinks, it seems to him that tolerance, a mild indifferentism, is the highest thing. Creeds are nothing—all religions may be fused into one before the Father's throne. He may rest on that belief, and not trouble about how he believes.

No sooner has he thought thus than the Garment leaves his hand, and he is whirled away by the storm. He knows then that he has slipped into a wrong way of thinking; and his passion to recover union with Christ makes him leap out of his genial mood of indifferentism. "I may still hold," he thinks, "that all wanderers will be brought to God by God's own ways—but, for myself, this will not do. I may not idly sleep in this thought. I must, for myself, know God. Indifferentism will not do for me. No, nor for any man. There must be one chief, best way of worship for me. I must find that, and contrive to share it with my fellows. I am a man, linked to men, and to help them I must find the nearest way to God. My own soul and God; and all God says to me—that is the one living, passionate matter in which all indifferentism is burned up like a scroll. Only when that union is gained can I help mankind." In this new thought he recovers Christ—

> Soul of mine, hadst thou caught and held
> By the hem of the Vesture . . .
> And I caught
> At the flying Robe, and unrepelled
> Was lapped again in its folds full-fraught
> With warmth and wonder and delight,
> God's mercy being infinite!
> And scarce had the words escaped my tongue
> When, at a passionate bound, I sprung
> Out of the wandering world of rain
> Into the little chapel again.

And there he remains. This mode of worship, with all its sordidness, with all the demerit of the preacher, is the best, because in it all earthly aids are cast behind, and the soul is thrown only on God. The human veil is thinnest then; the human soul is meekest, and the spiritual union between the soul and God is then unencumbered by the sensuous ritual or the intellectual criticism. What matters that the preacher is uneducated and rough, and the service disagreeable. The main thing is: Has the worship brought comfort, peace, forgiveness, love, to poor, worn, conscience-stricken human souls, to such ruins of humanity as were in the chapel. "May such comfort be mine," says Browning, "and may it be the Pope's when he is sick of all the outward show of his ritual and wants inward realities; and may the Göttingen Professor also have its peace when the darkness of death draws near

> And he gropes for something more substantial
> Than a fable, myth or personification,
> May Christ do for him what no mere man shall,
> And stand confessed as the God of Salvation.

Therefore I choose here, and join in the Hymn; referring all who blame me to God, who knows that under the light froth of my humour, the depths of my soul are in earnest."

Such is the conclusion of this roving piece of thinking, in which Browning has traversed so many side issues, and interpolated in those issues so many codicils of thought, so many parentheses of feeling; while, beneath, the movement of the main current is serious, deep and full—independent of the outward scenery and illustrations, of all the lively, broad and playful humour, of all the vivid description of humanity. The sketches of the folk in the Chapel are not more vital than those of the people in the mighty Church of St. Peter at Rome, than those of the Professor and the students at Göttingen. As everywhere throughout this poet's work, it is not only the soul of men and women which is described, but their body, their dress, their gestures, their living appearance; painted to the life as by Mantegna. But Christ is left in the supernatural. It is a vision unoutlined, undefined, that the poet sees. Once, for a moment, he beholds the face of the Lord, and he falls prostrate before its brightness. For the rest, he knows nothing but the Garment's hem, folded in which he is swept along as a path were hollowed,

And a man went weltering through the ocean,
Sucked along in the flying wake
Of the luminous water-snake.

It is the action of the Garment alone which tells him whether his thinking is just or not. It leaves him when he goes wrong; it is possible to grasp it again, when he thinks aright. And what with the wild preparation of the moonlit sky, with its menace of cloud and glory of rainbow, for the apparition of Christ; and the inconceivable speed of his flight in the "sweepy" folds of the flying garment, and the immanent silence in which all is done—there is scarcely any vision in English literature more clearly set than this in the supernatural world.

And it is not the Vision of a man, coming from the spiritual world. It is the Vision of the God-man—of God himself in Christ, God become man. It has been said that Browning did not mean to state his personal beliefs in part at least of this poem. But, at this point, his belief is clear; and it is full of interest to know what it was and to record it. Christ was to him God,— the Love of God, the infinite Spirit, who cured sin, to whom he prayed, whom he worshipped, very Man and very God, who trod this earth in weakness, shame and pain, and dying on the accursed tree, shall come again the One God, all in all,

King of Kings, and Lord of Lords.
As his servant John received the words,
"I died and live for evermore."

And his comment on the Göttingen critic's lecture confirms this view. So also does the "Death in the Desert," and more perhaps than all, the close of the "Letter of Karshish" to his master,—

The very God! think, Abib; dost thou think?
So, the All-Great were the All-Loving too—
So, through the thunder comes a human voice
Saying, "O heart I made, a heart beats here!
Face my hands fashioned, see it in myself!
Thou hast no power nor mayst conceive of mine,
But love I gave thee, with myself to love,
And thou must love me who have died for thee."
The madman saith He said so: it is strange.

We are too much accustomed to think that men of intelligence, aware of the results of modern criticism, both historical and theological, cannot, with any truth to themselves, hold, believe, and love the doctrine of the Divinity of Christ. It is a custom of thinking of which we ought to clear their minds, for it isolates us too much from a vast mass of human thought and emotion. Here, at least—and it is well to take this into our thinking—here is one of the foremost intellects in England, and one of the highest imaginative power, to whom that doctrine was believable, who loved it, and to whose spirit it brought, not only life, but the explanation of the world he needed.

LITERATURE.

STUDIES OF SHAKESPEARE.*

A new edition of "Studies of Shakespeare," by the Rev. Frank Walters, affords a welcome opportunity for drawing fresh attention to this admirable little book.

These interpretations of half-a-dozen of the plays are not remarkable as contributing new matter to the vast mass of Shakespeare literature, but for a manner that makes old interpretations new and invests old stories with a fresh vitality, full of meaning for us to-day. Indeed, their modern tone is one characteristic of the "Studies," which in this respect form a contrast to the "Tales from Shakespeare." Charles and Mary Lamb take their readers back into the old days of fairy-tale and romance, and by their familiarity with Elizabethan literature they are able to adapt their language and style to their Elizabethan subject. Mr. Walters brings the old stories forward out of the far past into the living present, and his insight into the inner meaning of the plays and into the human heart of the characters makes his subject seem modern. The "Tales" remain a classic for children and for all who, like Charles and Mary Lamb, love our old literature. But some amongst the more thoughtful and earnest of our young people may consider these "Tales" childish, old-fashioned, and unreal, and some are also repelled at first rather than attracted by the tragedies themselves. First impressions are of a life that is far away in the barbarous past without any connection with our own time; for such readers the "Studies" may well serve as a bridge across the centuries, linking our life, with its difficulties, its problems, its failures, its tragedies, to those of a Hamlet, a Cordelia, a Lear.

The book treats of Shakespeare, not as illustrating Elizabethan language or literature, manners or customs, but as an interpretation of human life. It appeals to various classes of readers, and it is so interesting throughout that it deserves a wide circulation, not only in our Sunday-schools and Elder Scholars' Societies, but also amongst the general public. Since the first edition was published in 1889, many commentaries and some lives of Shakespeare have appeared, of great interest to the student of literature, but there has been no other book for the general reader treating of the plays simply as earnest stories of human life.

Of changes in this new edition, the first to be noticed is an improved frontispiece, a print of the familiar Chandos portrait in the National Portrait Gallery being substituted for the rather commonplace portrait at the Stratford birthplace. To the introductory "Life of Shakespeare" is added a chapter on the "Genius of Shakespeare." An original quatrain is also inserted, as motto, at the beginning of each of the six studies. The mottoes on "King Lear," "Othello," "Winter's Tale," and "The Merchant of Venice," are devoted to the heroines, that on "Hamlet" to the hero, whilst in the one on "Macbeth" the hero and heroine share the honour between them.

In the first edition William Watson's epigram on "King Lear" stood at the head of the study of that play.

Here Love the slain with Love the slayer lies;
Deep drowned are both in the same sunless pool.
Up from its depths, that mirror thundering skies,
Bubbles the wan mirth of the mirthless fool.

For this, in the new edition, a quatrain is substituted, which gives us less of the atmosphere of storm and stress, but also, by focussing attention on Love the slain, a less sunless result.

Love vows to banishment from home and state,
The silent Love struck by a blow so stern;
To share the Father's doom and yield to fate,
As quenchless Daughterhood does Love return.

The slayer and the slain may be deep drowned in the same dark pool, but Love survives as ideal daughterhood. This modification of key is characteristic of Mr. Walters' treatment of Shakesperian tragedy. There are worse things than death—the madness, crime, hardness or blindness that have preceded it, and, perhaps, been its cause. And when we are brought face to face with the slayers and the slain at the close of each tragedy, the gloom is not unrelieved. We are reminded of those elements in life that remain untouched by death—Lady Macbeth's awakened remorse, Lear's chastened will and purified affection, Othello's restored faith, and Desdemona's unwavering fidelity.

The most interesting change in the second edition is the one referred to by the author in the Preface: "In the study of 'Hamlet' I have, chiefly by means of omissions, somewhat modified my estimate of the hero's character."

The passages omitted are just those which, however slightly, indicated blame of Hamlet. The nature of these omissions is significant, and their effect on the interpretation of the hero is characteristic of the general tone of the Studies.

By his usual method Mr. Walters helps us to feel with the characters rather than to analyse them, to understand them from within rather than to judge them from without. He writes as if he had a personal knowledge of the people in the plays, as if he knew their history, their circumstances, their difficulties, temptations, hopes and ambitions. He helps us, too, to understand; and the better we understand the less inclined shall we, too, be to criticise and sit in judgment.

It requires considerable exercise of imagination to put oneself in another's place, to create for oneself his circumstances and thus to realise his difficulties. It is so easy, on the other hand, to label people in fiction or in real life by their most obvious faults.

> These men,—
> Carrying, I say, the stamp of one defect,
> . . . Their virtues else, be they as pure as grace,
> As infinite as men may undergo,
> Shall in the general censure take corruption
> From that particular fault.

Hamlet's protest against this labelling and pigeon-holing of our neighbours by their defects has not saved him from a like fate. Goethe's interpretation of Hamlet has, in some quarters, been reduced to a mere label of weakness, unfitness for his task, and this is very convincing—for a time.

But Shakespeare's methods lead us surely, however slowly, to a distrust of even the most convenient of labels. In the Shakespearian drama the dramatis personæ are grouped and disposed so as to present their different sides in turn. They are placed in juxtaposition to first one and then another, and it is our own fault if in the movement of the play we fail to perceive the various aspects of a character, the various motives for action. Having once perceived the variety of aspect and of motive, we shall not long rest content with any labelling system based on one aspect and one motive.

In Mr. Walters' revised edition Hamlet has emerged from his pigeon-hole, has discarded his label. Delays in achieving his purpose are admitted, but they are no longer emphasised as a distinguishing badge of character. Judgment is withheld, and the result is an interpretation of the hero that stimulates the reader to a careful investigation of all the circumstances and a comprehensive understanding of the character.

The interpretation of "Hamlet" being thus brought into harmony with the general tone of the Studies, we may hope that in the next edition the part of Ophelia, too, may be raised to the standard which Mr. Walters has led us to expect.

Ruskin labelled Ophelia as "the one weak woman in Shakespeare," and Ruskin's argument, like Hamlet's label, is very convincing—for a time. But it is one-sided, and a reaction is inevitable. Compared to much modern criticism on Ophelia Mr. Walters' treatment is gentle and considerate, but he is inclined to consider successive situations as they affect Hamlet and Hamlet only.

The assumption of an "engagement" between Ophelia and Hamlet is not justified by the play, and is unfair to Ophelia; the contrast is also unfair between her "alarm" and flight, on one occasion, with Portia's determination to share the trouble of Brutus. Brutus was Portia's husband; Hamlet was Ophelia's lover, and a lover who had apparently not yet declared himself a suitor.

Mr. Walters' later interpretation of the device of the three caskets in "The Merchant of Venice" might be applied with advantage to the difficulties of Ophelia's position in the early scenes. Ophelia's action, like Portia's of Belmont, is restricted by a father's decree; she is not free to offer sympathy like "Portia, Cato's daughter."

There will always be different interpretations of Shakespeare's plays and of Shakespeare's characters, and different degrees of sympathy towards different characters. No interpretation can be regarded as final. Only Shakespeare himself can give us his many-sided wisdom of life—and Shakespeare not in one play only, but in all the plays. And how little of this wisdom of life can any one of us grasp at one time! A writer may dwell on one or another aspect of the plays. Mr. Walters interprets for us Shakespeare's great-hearted human sympathy and his conviction of a Divine Providence in the moral order of the universe. So much is he impressed by Shakespeare's interpretation of Divine Providence that Mr. Walters claims even too much. At the end of the introductory chapter, by illustrations from Oliver Wendell Holmes and Browning, and with Falstaff as example, he treats in an interesting manner of the objective and subjective aspects of Shakespeare's genius.

Shakespeare not only gives the world's ideal of a man, and the man's ideal of himself; in a reticent and reverent way, and yet with an austere justice, he does also indicate the Divine judgment on his life.

This statement, and the further one that Shakespeare "admits us into the secret of Heaven's judgment on such a life" as Falstaff's, seem to require qualification. Shakespeare may indicate his interpretation of the Divine judgment, but we may not, by identifying the two, limit the Divine judgment to Shakespeare's interpretation of it.

> For the Love of God is broader > Than the measure of man's mind.

And even Shakespeare's "boundless, cloudless human view" is still a human view. It is enough that Shakespeare brings us closer to the great heart of humanity, and nearer to the mystery of the justice and mercy of God.

WESLEY'S JOURNAL.*

MESSRS. ISBISTER have given to the world in moderate compass a most delightful book: an abridgment, well managed, of the "Journal of John Wesley." It is worth reading through from beginning to end just as it stands; it will be worth picking up again many a time for another quarter of an hour with the tireless preacher, and another glimpse of the people to whom he preached.

In an introduction whose great merit is its brevity, the Rev. H. Price Hughes declares that the future of the Empire depends on "this question of questions—Will George Fox and John Wesley on the one hand, or John Henry Newman on the other ultimately prevail?" While the Empire is settling that question the reader can go on and enjoy Wesley's Journal with all the more delight; yes, and with all the more spiritual profit from his confidence that Providence has not handed our souls over to the one or the other. Wesley is a man we are bound to admire; our admiration increases as we follow him from place to place, from period to period; his settled fixed conviction, resulting as it does in such dauntless ceaseless activity, and such incomparable audacity, fascinates us more and more, and we simply give ourselves away in our wonder and delight. But surely one foundation of our enjoyment is that after all we are never liable to meet another like him. We have not the terror upon us of the living company of one whose conscience was so relentless not only for himself but for others. The man who could walk up to a gentleman who was supposed not to be religious, and say, "Sir, are you a sinner?" and who when some gay-looking folks walked away without hearing him could remark, "These pretty fools never thought that for this opportunity they are to give an account before men and angels," is a delightful character to read of. His conviction that he was intended to preach, and that all the people he could lay hold of were intended primarily to be preached at, was the foundation of so much effective work, was the motive power of such an unexampled career of travel and speech, that we assent to it while we are reading, as we would assent to an incredible plot in a novel, but it is rather a relief to feel afterwards that it is not true!

Wesley's great work in the world is so certain and of such vast and almost measureless dimensions, that his manner of life needs no justification. His own deeds praise him, and his myriads of followers rise up to call him blessed. All the more freely may one be permitted to smile at his unconscious arrogance, and to put aside as now obsolete a great deal of that which he preached as gospel. Wesley himself may be our tutor in this also. When a woman came to him with the word of the Lord charging him with taking his ease and minding only his eating and drinking (it must be confessed she was not very lucky in her choice of reprovable sins) he told her with sound common-sense that if the Lord had sent her to him he would have given her a more proper message. A very excellent answer. Even so we know that when Heaven has a message for us it will not be in the language of the sermon on the Great Assize; and if Providence send us instruction about the bringing up of children it will not take the form of that little series of sermons in which John Wesley insists with such vehemence that we are to "break the child's will." With that assurance there is hardly a page in this abridged journal of an admirable man from which we may not gain pleasure or profit, or both. In one thing Wesley's character bore a decided resemblance to that of the great Churchman to whom he has been several times compared. He was in a very special sense of the word self-controlled. He did nothing but that which he deliberately intended to do. He does, indeed, say of that antagonist who proved afterwards to be the worse "mounted" of the two (p. 84), "he caught me unawares and dragged me into the dispute"; but that man had not to drag very hard. When Wesley chose not to dispute he knew how to keep quiet. "I judged it quite needless to enter into a dispute with a sea captain seventy-five years old," he remarks in one place. Several remarks made elsewhere seem to show that when he chose to administer a severe chastisement to the Society, i.e., to a group of his own disciples; or when he chose to preach what he somewhere calls a thundering sermon to sinners he deliberately measured the amount of anger as much as Newman did when he poured out his wrath on Kingsley. He told one Society "they were the most ignorant, self-conceited, self-willed, fickle, untractable, disorderly, disjointed society that I knew in the three kingdoms." And he adds, "God applied it to their hearts." But having to administer reproof caused him just about as little distress as having to suffer interruption and insult. He knew his business and performed it in the one case as in the other. Preaching and riding so perpetually, defying the weather, and interpreting the auguries nearly always affirmatively, it is a remarkable proof of his perfect coolness, and a certain almost incredible detachment that he should not only observe acutely whatever was going on in the towns which he visited, but was able besides as he rode on horseback to renew his classic studies.

One day he tells us he has just read the tenth "Iliad," another day he records his impressions of the "Thebais" of Statius, and often by some reference or quotation shows that he has never ceased to take interest in a branch of knowledge far removed from the main line of his life's duty, and as many of his followers would have thought barely consistent therewith. This capacity for detachment, like his ability to sleep at will, had much to do with that constant renewal of strength which made it possible for him to continue his labours without diminution till at a very advanced age. At seventy-nine years he finds no more pain or bodily infirmities than at twenty-five. For years longer he still travels, still observes, still records his opinions with equal precision and confidence whether upon matters that he understands better than almost any man, or upon subjects of which he can have but a very superficial acquaintance. And all these judgments add to the interest of the diary. We may question his verdict even when he talks of Luther on Galatians, but we shall gladly hear him on that subject or any other; he may deride the doctors; or he may back his own opinion against all the musicians in Europe, but he is John Wesley and we like to hear him. J. Ruddle.

THE MABINOGION.*

The latest thing in shilling shockers, with a title of some distinction and promise, is the first impression the habitué of the bookstall or circulating library is likely to gather from the paper-cover issue of these volumes. To some the name of Lady Charlotte Guest will be its own guarantee for a better shilling's worth, and if any have the caution to turn to the title-page before embarking upon the purchase, they will find the work more justly described as a translation from the Red Book of Hergest. Concerning the Red Book of Hergest, the general editor's introduction gives an adequate description, whence we may quote that it is "a collection of tales and poems written during the fourteenth century."

All this we may get without any discount of pleasure from suggested associations with ephemeral literature by reading the book in its cloth issue; than which nothing at the price could well be in better taste or in better keeping with the dignified simplicity of the charming contents. A national classic worthy to take rank amongst the few best things of its kind in the world's literature, not merely for historic or antiquarian interest, but for the intrinsic excellence of the literary achievement, the young-hearted of all ages are to be congratulated on this felicitous introduction to it, in the form of a cheap and admirable reprint. For it deals with one of those pleasant by-ways of literature too seldom accessible to the journeymen of our times; heard of afar by the references of the few whose private purse or public duties admit of deviations from the highway.

These volumes carry us back into the cycle of Arthurian legends, where we may recline with doughty knights in rush-strewn halls, with ample fare of frizzled boar's collops and mead galore, listening enthralled to tales of parlous happenings and blood-curdling emprise. And withal not oppressed are we by any means with any sense of the unfitting. We are not ashamed of our company. It is just one glorious game of "let's pretend"; and the encroaching shades of the prison-house roll back while > . . . that child's heart within the man's

> Begins to move and tremble.

All the force of the mystic difference is revealed between "ponies" and "palfries," "damozels" and "girls," and all the varied potencies that cling about old terminologies. Enough, anyhow, to give piquancy to these tales and yield to tired minds refreshment in the contemplation even of the rugged mountains and barren deserts of which, it would seem, this fair realm of Britain once provided a plenty for the behoof of the dejected or adventurous.

The pageantry of colour that shimmers through these pages is not their least remarkable feature. Indeed, it is naïvely confessed of a certain "dream" included amongst the stories that it could never be recited without a MS. because of the number and variety of the colours presented by the objects introduced.

Pleasantly as the translation reads, we should consider it more adequate if the spelling were also translated to the Saxon usage. The letters of the English alphabet have a different phonetic equivalent in Welsh, and at present there are many names in this book which might indeed make fun for a guessing competition on winter evenings, but are not to be read aloud without further instruction of the initiated. Guinevere scarcely gains upon our esteem as Gwenhwyvar; and Glewlwyd Gavaelvawr is well deserving of an explanatory footnote to himself. Whatever they may lose in appeal to the fancy, tales of this sort gain in historic value in proportion as they are rid of the meretricious charms of mere quaintness or needless puzzlement.

A curious want of humour characterises the narration of these tales, which makes them, from their very matter-of-factness, the more entertaining. Take for instance this passage from the story called "The Lady of the Fountain":—

> And the Black Knight was allowed to enter, and the portcullis was let fall upon Owain; and it struck his horse behind the saddle, and cut him in two. . . . And the rowels of the spurs and part of the horse were without, and Owain with the other part of the horse remained between the two gates, and the inner gate was closed. . . and Owain was in a perplexing situation.

Or this, from the tale of "Peredur, the son of Eorawe":—

> "Arise thou, my life, and take the cudgel . . . and draw blood from the yellow-haired youth if thou canst." So Peredur arose, and went to play with the yellow-haired youth; and he lifted up his arm, and struck him such a mighty blow that his brow fell over his eye and the blood flowed forth.

Peredur then receives the congratulations of his long-lost uncle and a promise of guardianship, and all furtherance in matters of "courtesy and gentleness and noble bearing."

The book is very interesting for the sidelights it affords upon the period of history to which it relates.

It is a less idealised and, we fear we must add, more sordid picture than modern poetry has given us of those dim days. But it is softened to us with much of the best graces of early romance; and it is a piece of national literature which we hope may be followed by much more in a not less excellent and accessible form.

THE MELBOURNE CHURCH.

Sir,—May I ask for a small portion of your space to support Mr. Bowie's appeal in favour of this church? Only one who has laboured in the Colonies can appreciate the difficulties which beset a minister's work there. He works alone, without ministerial fellowship. He seldom gets the help in his own congregation of men and women trained by long experience in the principles and methods of our churches, in a measure so available at home. At the moment the colony is going through a commercial crisis more acute, it is said, than that which followed the bank failures of ten years ago. To make matters worse clouds hang over the Unitarians of New South Wales and South Australia which darken prospects and depress workers. Amid such difficulties the Rev. R. H. Lambley is doing valorous work. Just recovered from illness, longing for the joys of comradeship in common labours at home, yet he has determined to remain at his post while it is possible until the worst is over and the church is safe. If any man's work deserves the support of those able to help, his does. If any minister ought to be sustained until his task is done, he ought. I hope he will get the £500 he asks for.

REV. STOPFORD BROOKE AT UNITY CHURCH.

APPEAL FOR THE NORTH LONDON NURSING ASSOCIATION.

THERE was a large congregation at Unity Church, Islington, on Sunday evening to hear the Rev. Stopford Brooke's sermon on behalf of the North London Nursing Association. The devotional part of the service was conducted by Dr. Hicks, and appropriate music was rendered by the organist and choir. Mr. Stopford Brooke took for his text II. Cors. vi, 10, "As poor, yet making many rich; as having nothing, and yet possessing all things." St. Paul, he said, was a poor man, yet not poor in the sense that many thousands are to-day. He was not without food, clothing, warmth, air and light; he was not in the midst of squalor, misery and dirt, as multitudes of men, women and children are in our modern cities, whom we call our brothers and children of God. He was poor as one of our working mechanics is poor; he had enough of the material supports of life to exist without anxiety, but none of the superfluous luxuries which surround the rich. Yet he had possessions of another kind that enabled him to make others rich in another way than is usually meant by the word. He had obtained from Christ the great truths of the divine Fatherhood and of human Sonship, of Love as the essence of spiritual being, and these ideas, although they brought no worldly advantage, had all the wealth of God in them. Out of them sprang two mighty faiths, that had in them vital power and strength. One was that we men and women belong to one corporate society, one vast family at unity with itself and with God. Think what that meant for the captive, the slave, the lowliest exile! No one was to be thought of as any longer alone on earth; each might feel his right to participate in the universal life here and now. That was the first great socialism ever preached on earth; the doctrine of all for one and one for all. The other was that this vast society was only a part of the whole kingdom of spirits. Beyond death the continuity was preserved, and each one was a rightful member of the larger fellowship. These faiths were the true wealth of human souls, and they who possessed them could communicate unlimited treasure. Teachers could give of their knowledge, sympathetic souls could give of their love.

The nurses for whom he was speaking that night were making others rich in that way. So well trained were they that 150 doctors during the past year had begged for their services. There was not room in the hospitals for anything like all the poor invalids of London, and some of them preferred to remain in their homes. The nurses were an infinite comfort to the poor; a few visits from them, and the home was a different thing. There ought to be an institution like this in every London district, and connected with it a convalescent home. The well-off could always afford the care and skill they needed; it was sad to think that these labourers after doing their work so well should now be in want of money to enable them to carry it on.

Lastly, referring to the latter part of the text, he reminded his hearers that what we give of the wealth of love we do not lose but gain, what we give of immortal things we receive again in accumulated measure. Having some of the wealth of the world, our duty was to give it, and to give it with gladness, especially when the giving of it would contribute to the bestowal of spiritual wealth, beyond money and price.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

"Hitch your waggon to a star."—Emerson.

Is not this a strange saying? How can you fasten your waggon up to a star? There must be some meaning hidden in the words. Let us see if the story of "Michael the Angel," which I am going to tell you, helps to make it clear.

More than 400 years ago a little lad was learning his lessons in the Grammar School at Florence, in Italy; but every spare moment he was to be seen with pencil and paper trying to make drawings of things about him, working with the greatest pains to copy them correctly. At times, his friends used to find him gazing at the wonderful pictures in the public buildings in Florence; and they used to say to each other, "See how the child loves what is beautiful." To his great joy, it was settled he should be trained to be an artist, and henceforward, while other children were at play in the sunshine, Michael used to work in the close, hot studio, or study the forms of animals in the noisy market till he was ready to fall asleep for weariness. His talent was great; but he was also very diligent, and thought nothing too trifling to be worth taking pains over. For these reasons there came a day when his master exclaimed, "This youth knows more of art than I do myself." But you must know also that there was a little voice within Michael which whispered that God had given him this love of beauty to be used to make the world better and happier.

Now Florence had a powerful Governor, Lorenzo de Medici, who was always ready to encourage rising artists, and he admitted Michael into his palace garden that he might copy the beautiful statues there. Hitherto, Michael had never tried to carve marble or to use a sculptor's tools, and Lorenzo was amazed to find soon that Michael had made a wonderful copy of a marble faun's head, and was still more pleased to note that he would not rest till by close perseverance he had made his faun even better than the original. In the palace Michael met poets and wise men, who made him their companion and let him share their beautiful thoughts, and thus fresh dreams of beauty came to him and filled his soul with a love of grand poetry, so that it was as if he entered into a new world; and still a little voice within him whispered that his love of what was beautiful came from Heaven, and that he must use the gift to serve God and his fellow-men.

A famous preacher in Florence had great influence over Michael. He used to tell the crowds of people who went to listen to his sermons about putting a religious spirit into all their work, whatever it might be, and Michael resolved that he would do his work as an artist in this spirit—painting pictures that should make people better for looking at them. So it came about that all he sculptured and drew was so grand and beautiful that in time he had the name of the "Divine Master" given to him, because it was said he gained his help from God; and while he was still young and other artists were coming to his studio to learn from him, he used to try to impart to them these high aims.

We can thus picture Michael Angelo helping to fill the world with beauty, but there is something more to know about him. He had by nature a violent temper, and it was hard work to control it when people vexed him and were ungenerous and rude to him. There is no room here to tell of all the vexations he met with. The Pope sent for him to Rome to do some beautiful work there, and then kept the great artist wasting his time overlooking the quarrying out of marble for his statues for eight months, instead of spending a little of his great wealth to pay someone else to do this necessary work. On other occasions, angry at the thoughtless, unfair treatment he received, Michael gave up his work for a time and left the city; but gradually, as he grew towards perfection as a sculptor, he also grew nobler as a man, and more anxious to forgive and live in peace.

Have you heard of the ceiling in the Sistine Chapel in Rome which was painted by Michael Angelo? Think of the patience this work required. He had to lie on his back on the high scaffolding to draw the beautiful figures. The consequent pain and weariness he endured for months; and he injured his eyes so much that for a long time afterwards he was unable to use them. He was more than seventy years of age when he began his greatest work—the Cathedral of St. Peter in Rome. All over Europe now are to be found in picture galleries and churches the grand statues and paintings of sacred subjects by which he made the world so much richer. One thing I must tell you to show how he cared to help and be kind to people in little ways. After he had become a famous sculptor he met with a poor travelling pedlar, and to help him to earn a little money, and also to please the poor country people among whom the pedlar used to carry his wares, Michael used at times to lay aside his important work and spend hours in making carved crosses and little statues to beautify some humble homes.

One bitter winter day Michael was seen to cross the snow to study some grand ruins in Rome, and when asked why he, so feeble, was out on such a day, he answered, "I still go to school that I may continue to learn." Was not that a grand spirit in an old man who had come nearly to the end of a long life, and was held in great honour for the work he had done? His real name was Michael Angelo Buonarotti—I think people do well to call him by the loving title of "Michael the Angel."

And now what about "hitching our waggon to a star"? Does it not mean that in our common, everyday lives we must keep some high aim before us shining like a star; that, like Michael Angelo, we must listen to the little voice within, and have a good purpose in view by which to rule our daily thoughts and deeds?

JAMES MARTINEAU.

There is published this week in England and America, in two large volumes, "The Life and Letters of James Martineau."* This is the authorised Life of our revered and beloved Teacher, by Dr. Drummond and Professor Upton, his successors in Manchester College as Principal and Professor of Philosophy—written with command of the amplest materials, with full knowledge and profound sympathy, by the two men who were nearest to him of any after the departure of his contemporary and most intimate friends. The work is not composite in the sense of being woven throughout by two hands, for Dr. Drummond is the sole author of the biographical portion, the "Life and Letters" proper, which fills the first and half of the second volume, while Professor Upton contributes in nine more chapters an independent "Survey of Dr. Martineau's Philosophical Work."

We receive these volumes as a very precious gift. No other book published in our time can affect us quite as this does. It was two years last January since Dr. Martineau was taken from our midst, and while we have always the great treasure he has left us in his published works, in which he himself must always live and speak to us as teacher, with wonderful quickening power, as prophet of the higher life and seer of the things of God, yet here in the story of his life, and above all in his own letters, there is something more given to us, for which we have waited with eager anticipation and into which we enter now, as into a new and beautiful inheritance.

There will of course be criticism from many sides of this record of a long and strenuous life, no stranger to the storms of inward conflict and the centre of more than one acute public controversy; but for the most part it will be the critics who are judged by the spirit of this man, into whose intimacy we are now permitted to enter as never before; and far beyond all questions of controversy are the transcendent gifts and the gracious influence of one whose memory is an inspiration and a constant benediction. There is a brief autobiographical record, of the greatest interest, which Dr. Drummond has been able to use, and Dr. Martineau's letters go back to the years of his earliest manhood, though naturally of greater fulness in the latter half of his more than ninety years. Here we have, from the early days of the first publication of the "Endeavours after the Christian Life," and throughout a career of the closest brotherly fellowship, letters of his to the late John Hamilton Thom, and others to that elder friend, so closely bound in affection and spiritual sympathy to these two, John James Tayler. Of the rest, Francis Newman and Richard Holt Hutton are the two correspondents to whom in this record Dr. Martineau opens the riches of his mind and heart most completely; but there are many other letters, and some of the most interesting to American correspondents, through which we now hear his voice again, and gain fresh insight into the secret of his life, so sensitive and distrustful of self, yet so glorious in its strength, nurtured at the secret sources of Divine communion, beautiful as few others in its rare gifts, rich in stimulus for all that is best and noblest in human life, and wonderfully generous in its outpouring of helpful sympathy.

A full notice of this book it will be our happiness to commence next week. This is only an immediate word of thankfulness and of warm congratulation to the authors on the completion of their task.

CITIZEN SUNDAY.

To-morrow is Citizen Sunday, when from at least five hundred London pulpits attention will be directed to the claims of civic and social life on men and women professing religion. The value of such an institution as affording a definite opportunity of pressing such claims will be apparent to every earnest-minded man. None of us to-day can be indifferent to social questions. They have no mere accidental prominence such as might arise by political contriving or by some sudden social calamity stirring us to-day and leaving us unconcerned to-morrow. Their prominence has been brought about by the law of progress; it is the result of a gradual evolutionary process. They are here, and they have come to stay till we can find some solution for them.

The questions themselves lie in their immediate scope just outside the commercial and industrial problems. They are questions affecting the development of life in its beauty and its strength; they are concerned with the removal or control of what is hurtful, with the increase of opportunity and efficiency, with the possibilities that lie in stunted and impoverished aspirations after good, marred by slum life and the ceaseless toil for a pittance. But, restricted as they are in their immediate scope, in their ultimate reach they cover the whole of our social life. Such questions as those of Old Age Pensions, of Temperance Reform, of the Housing of the Poor, of the protection and training of destitute children, involve vast interests and affect the furthest opposite shores of society. For this very reason each one of them depends for its solution on motives and interests more or less directly amenable to religious influence. At the head of all problems, therefore, stands that which presses upon us increasingly year by year—namely, how to bring religion to bear upon life.

It is sometimes objected against the treatment of civic and social questions in the pulpit that preachers often lack the technical knowledge necessary to deal with them, and but half understand the problems which they handle. Such an objection can only hold in particular cases where men are rash enough to technically handle subjects with the details of which they are unacquainted. We are speaking to the pulpit as well as to the pew. It would be well for preachers to be more guarded as to this. Nothing can more surely weaken a man's influence and damage the cause he has at heart than the display of ignorance in public places. Let him either obtain the requisite knowledge or else frankly disclaim pretension to it. But should he have to disclaim pretension to it—and here we speak to the pew as well as the pulpit—is he on that score disqualified for pressing home social and civic duty? Those who say so forget that there are not only technical details to be adjusted and practical schemes to be worked out, but principles of a fundamental character on the acceptation or rejection of which the whole trend of the application rests. It is these principles, we take it, which form the preacher's chief province. It is these principles we have in mind when we speak of religion. If religion has any potency, or, indeed, any meaning, its place is here among the problems and questions affecting the life of the people. A religion that cannot cleanse the individual vision from the murk of self-interest, that does not clear the social atmosphere and give freedom to our higher impulses in social service, is only another complicating factor in our too complex life, and we were better without it. To such a religion we at any rate will own no allegiance. The religion we believe in does not and cannot exist per se. It can no more exist without visible and practical results than life can be said to exist apart from its manifestations.

In this sense we believe that every Sunday should be a "Citizen Sunday." We believe that what is wanted in our churches is a more practical pulpit tone. We believe that we have in the pulpit an organisation of immense practical value to the State, but which is to a great extent a mere vent for the escape of waste energy. We believe profoundly in the utility of moral appeal, but that appeal must be saturated with a consciousness of the needs of the day, if it is to be effective. How is it, we sometimes ask in amazement, that there is so much apathy, so little acute sense of responsibility proportionately to the mass of the population when there are some 50,000 sermons preached in the Church of England alone every Sunday! Of one thing we are certain, that until the pulpit does move into line with the actualities of life, the complaint of empty churches will continue, and religion remain a by-word to the unchurched and a grievous self-deception.

But the function of Citizen Sunday is more particularly to arouse in people a sense of their responsibility in regard to questions of a specific type such as we have instanced. The method adopted may consist in bringing one or more of these questions—the Housing Problem, or Lord PEEL'S Report on Temperance Reform—directly before the congregation, or, more broadly, it may consist in bringing people face to face with the way in which their brothers and sisters are living, to remind them of the essential homogeneity of the social problem, to urge upon them the duty of ridding their minds of prejudice, of reading and gathering information, of cultivating themselves and fostering in their children habits of intellectual clearness. What we particularly need in England to-day is a more widespread habit of sober, honest thought. As Mrs. BOSANQUET says at the conclusion of her new book, "The Strength of the People":—

> It cannot be a matter of indifference whether the public is hasty, emotional, ill-advised in its conclusions, or whether it brings a careful, disciplined judgment and understanding to bear on the situation. Even though it refrain from active interference, yet the consciousness of what are the sort of considerations likely to win its approval will certainly give increased weight to those considerations in determining the issue.

And by way of a text we might do worse than suggest the question which forms the motif of Mr. BARING-GOULD'S new story, "Nabo the Nailer," "How do I justify my existence?" This is a question which it were good for every one of us to ask himself every morning and answer every evening both as a citizen and as a man. The first recorded impression of Niagara is that of the American who said: "What a big concern all that water could drive!" There are in London alone vast volumes of individual wealth and energy and time, now wasted in stupendous luxury, in frivolity and idleness, that might, if organised and applied, be productive of incalculable benefit to the community. We talk about the need of a simpler life, and such indeed is needed; the question is: how can we simplify life? and to that question we know of but one answer: only from the motive of service, only by admitting the claims of our fellows—particularly those with whom we are brought into personal contact—on our leisure, our energy, our means.

To commend this as an ideal, to strenuously plead that the time has come for us, not in the spirit of fitful enthusiasm, but with calm yet earnest deliberation, to address ourselves to the divine task of reorganising and strengthening our national life, of removing the foul blots of poverty, bestiality, and crime, of taking our brothers and sisters by the hand and helping them upwards, of determining, so far as our own efforts are concerned, that the abiding glory of our cities in the annals of time shall be the orderliness and happiness of all who dwell within them—to commend this as an ideal, as the aim that alone can justify our place in civic life, is, we believe, the right way to further the ends of religion, and to employ those godlike faculties of order and love by virtue of which we are men.

MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD.

PUBLIC LECTURE AT THE OPENING OF THE SESSION.

THE session opened at Manchester College on Monday, when the public lecture was given by the Principal, the Rev. Dr. Drummond, in the presence of a large company of the friends and supporters of the College.

THE ART OF CRITICISM IN ITS APPLICATION TO THEOLOGICAL QUESTIONS.

The lecture was a valuable exposition of the true principles of criticism, illustrated by specific instances from the work of critics of early Christian literature, with warning against various forms of bias, from which neither the "apologetic" nor the "destructive" critic is free. With gentle irony and with clear demonstration of the errors of over-confidence and ill-regulated judgment Dr. Drummond dealt more especially with the "modern critic," while he traced the lines of a noble ideal in the single-minded search for truth.

Criticism, Dr. Drummond said, in its application to theological questions, may be defined as the art of judging correctly in cases resting upon probable evidence. Its object must be simply to ascertain the truth, not to defend or attack any fresh hypothesis or any traditional belief, and for this the critic must acquire facility and precision through careful training. Mere copiousness of learning is not enough; for, as in science, a man may have an extensive knowledge of facts and yet may have very little faculty of drawing the conclusions which are indicated by the facts, so, in criticism, there are men who abound in extensive and curious information, and yet are remarkable for a lack of scholarly judgment.

As to the qualifications of a critic, the first need is of moral qualifications of a very high order, which may be summed up in devotion to the will of God.

"All self-regard, such as the love of reputation, or admiration for one's own acuteness, or a desire to dazzle and startle, or the complacency of an orthodox immobility, tends to warp the judgment; and it is only by losing self in a Higher than self that we can acquire that simplicity of mind which sees facts exactly as they are, and receives from them, without distortion, their natural impression. It is sometimes said that religion blinds the eyes, and stands in the way of progress, but it is not so. Theological bias may cloud the intellect and render it inaccessible to evidence; but pure religion, the surrender of self to the Eternal Spirit, clarifies the understanding, and, brushing off the dust and stains of prejudice, presents the judgment as a polished mirror for the reflection of truth."

Analysing this general rule, the lecturer showed how it involves the sincere love of truth, which amid the sectarian conditions of Christendom is far from a common virtue. Love of opinion and party allegiance too often stand in the way of the pure love of truth. It involves also humility and candour, and sympathy, which can enter into the mind of another, and apprehend a point of view different from our own.

To these moral qualifications others must be added. The critic must have acuteness of observation and a power of marshalling minute details. Yet this must be balanced by a certain largeness of mind, which can place a conclusion in its proper relation to the general field of knowledge and estimate correctly the wider probabilities affecting it. "The critic must have not only the mind of an explorer, who can find his way along untrodden paths, but still more a sobriety of judgment which will enable him to maintain a judicial attitude towards every question, and a breadth of view by which he can apprehend the evidence as a whole, and allow to each part no more than its real weight."

The lecture then described the critic at his work, noting several essential rules, such as the need of proceeding from the known to the unknown, estimating the different degrees of probability in evidence, and, where secondary sources are used, the need of verifying references and reading the context. And it was shown how these rules affect such critical questions as arise in an inquiry into the external evidence of the origin of our canonical Gospels, the question whether Justin Martyr used those Gospels, or what the attitude of the Quartodecimans was towards the Fourth Gospel. This part of the lecture is difficult to summarise, but its method may be seen in the following passage:—

"It might be deemed superfluous to say that a critic must attend to the laws of evidence; but these laws are sometimes forgotten, and the would-be critic assumes the part of cross-examining counsel rather than that of the impartial judge. True criticism, when it has a witness before it, will carefully discriminate different kinds of statement. We may illustrate this canon by the case of Irenæus. Modern criticism has derived much enjoyment from bullying this venerable Bishop. He uses ridiculous arguments, but then men who are quite honest and quite sane do sometimes, down to this day, use ridiculous arguments. He gives a very inaccurate exposition of views which he dislikes. This should certainly make us cautious in accepting his representations; but this caution applies to most controversialists, for many men of the highest honour fail to understand the views of opponents, and give a very misleading description of them. He was extremely credulous; but this, though it may lead us to distrust his judgment, does not show that he was a fool, for men of the highest intellectual power have believed in such things as alchemy and witchcraft. And finally he ascribes to Jesus an extravagant saying, which is so unlike Christ's manner as exhibited in all the Gospels that we can have no hesitation in rejecting it. Owing to these failings it is proposed to dismiss Irenæus from court, on the plea that we must either accept all or reject all that a witness has got to say. This procedure, demanded though it be with airs of triumph, would be a reversal of criticism; for it is the duty of the judge to sift evidence and determine when we may accept the statements of a witness, and when they are open to serious question. Now it is not necessary to enter a court of justice to be aware that what a man affirms on his own knowledge rests on entirely different grounds from an opinion which he may express, an inference which he may draw, or a piece of gossip which he may report. Let us apply these principles to Irenæus. He tells us that he saw and heard Polycarp in his young days, that he remembers the exact place where the blessed man used to sit and discourse, his bodily appearance, how he came in and out, and the discourses which he held with the multitude. Now in a statement of this kind, we may say that it is practically impossible for him to have been mistaken in the main fact, and, if we reject it, we must set him down as a liar. He further tells us that he remembers how Polycarp reported his intercourse with John, and from other passages it is apparent that by John he meant the apostle. In this case it is possible that Irenæus made a mistake, either from having a wrong impression at the time, or through confusion of memory; and one may question this statement without assailing the veracity of the witness. Probably those who have attained the age of Irenæus, and try to imagine the case to be their own, will find it hardly conceivable that the Bishop could be mistaken on such a point; but still it must have a lower degree of probability than the statement that he heard Polycarp. Lastly, the saying ascribed to Christ clearly could not be attested by Irenæus at all, and of course he does not pretend to attest it. It rests ultimately on mere hearsay, coming from reporters whom Irenæus did not know, and whom it is impossible for us to examine; in other words, it is a kind of statement which, very properly, would not be admitted as evidence in a court of law. These examples may sufficiently illustrate our rule, that you must not only know the general character of your witness, but discriminate among his statements, some of which may be wholly worthless, while others possess a degree of probability amounting almost to certainty."

In conclusion, the lecture noted some sources of error to which the critic is liable, as in the failure to distinguish between conjecture and proof, and the fear of consequences, where traditional beliefs are clung to in the teeth of evidence. This last appears on the conservative side, and was rebuked in the following passage:—

"What an ignoble and distrustful thing is this dread of consequences. Is truth, then, our enemy, and dare we not look her in the face, lest the sight should turn us to stone? Can we suppose that truth will destroy truth, or that as we soar aloft from among the gibbering ghosts of dead superstitions we shall see less of God, and feel a less sacred awe as we gaze upon the vastness of His visible temple, or trace the unfolding of His providence through the dim reaches of history? Fear can only blind the eyes and harden the heart; and be assured that every reverent seeker, though he may be forced sorrowfully to part from ancient guides and to wander for a time through dark valleys, shall at last emerge into the light, and gaze with unveiled face upon those deep things of the Spirit which eye has not seen nor ear heard nor the heart of man conceived."

The last sentences of the lecture were in answer to the question how it is that men equally earnest, and competent, and free from dogmatic obligations, place such different values on the same arguments and arrive at such different conclusions.

"So long as we are among probabilities the personal element in our judgments cannot be wholly eliminated. We are finite beings, more or less subject to error; and it is one of the appointed ways of reaching truth, that thought should collide with thought, that one should detect what another has passed by unnoticed, and that the deviations of individual judgment should be checked by movements in other directions. It is thus that we slowly work our way towards concurrence, while in the process the freshness of our intellectual life is preserved. A lazy acquiescence in established thought deprives us of real insight, while the necessity of viewing our subject in various lights, and trying to define its outlines with ever-increasing accuracy, ensures the perpetuity of interest, and reveals many a beauty which otherwise might have escaped our observation. But while by our various paths we are toiling towards the same mountain-peak we may feel that we are brothers in the same great enterprise; we may admire brilliant efforts which seem to end in failure; we may help one another by kindly criticism, and move on as one victorious host, one in aim, one in loyalty of service, one in mutual affection and in veneration and love for the eternal Spirit of Truth."

WHAT THE LAITY MIGHT MAKE OF THEIR CHURCHES.*

By the Rev. J. Channing Pollard.

To do their part our laity need to remember first of all that the Church is not the minister; it is not a place of entertainment where they go to be pleased, or to admire the intellectual athletics and the dramatic and elocutionary power of the man in the pulpit; it is not a lecture association where they go for instruction. The Church is not the music, the ritual, the service or the minister, although in these directions it should aim after the best. It is an organisation, or voluntary association, of men, women and children for the search after God's truth and the divine life both for themselves and all mankind.

The People are the Church.

Let our laity realise that it is this, and, at once, its work will be seen to be theirs as well as the minister's; and that he is only chosen because of some special training, or aptitude, to take a leading part in a work which belongs to all, and for which each and all are responsible.

There is a common saying to the effect that "there are some churches which a fool could not empty, and others which an angel could not fill." Without approving of the church that is satisfied with a fool, we may see in the homely saying how very much the laity have to do with the success or failure of a particular church. In some cases our laity depend so much on the minister, that when he leaves, and their services are more than ever required, the work goes to pieces. Those churches where the laity depend wholly upon the minister, or can only live upon the excitement and novelty of a constant change of ministers, are doomed to the failure they have deserved. It may be said of them, as was said of the church of Sardis: "Thou hast a name that thou livest and art dead." Ministers may come and ministers may go, but the work of the Church must go on for ever.

To this end not only must our ministers be actively alive and in earnest, but we must make greater use of the abundant lay talent so much of which is lying dormant in our midst.

The Help of Lay Preachers.

Speaking generally, our laity are men and women of more than average ability; in intelligence, education, influence, wealth, and in character and life, they cannot be surpassed anywhere. And yet in what Church is this power of service so much neglected as in our own. How many lay-preachers' associations can we number? From our orthodox friends we may learn how in country districts to group our churches by calling forth the services of lay-preachers. The beautiful tribute paid, the other week, by Sir James Kitson to lay-preachers is one that we need to take seriously to heart. We have in our midst men and women well equipped, both educationally and spiritually, for this kind of service. We have others who have the spirit if not always the letter, who need our sympathy and encouragement. But we have emphasised the letter to the neglect of the spirit, and many of our lay brothers and sisters have been discouraged. We may be justly proud of our Unitarian tradition of culture and refinement, but, like other tradition, it has often proved a stumbling-block and a burden. So much has this been the case, that if I were asked to suggest a prayer to be read in our churches, I should be tempted to include the petition:—"From all false pride, pedantry, and the tyranny of refinement, Good Lord deliver us; that our speech and our preaching be not with enticing words of man's wisdom, but in demonstration of the spirit and of power."

In the time of the first great Churches of Christendom, a time that we now look back upon as ideal, there were no ministers at all, in the modern sense of the word. The work was done by earnest men and women, who, bound together for a common purpose, and, burning with a great conviction of the new kingdom of God, set the world on fire. Our laity need to be more in evidence. Let them join oftener with the minister in conducting the service, sometimes reading the lessons, and occasionally taking the sermon, or giving in its place an address suggested by that direct contact with the affairs of the world that the minister has not the advantage of. The Chinaman says of the native catechist: "He eats the foreigner's rice, so he preaches the foreigner's doctrine." In the same way there are certain people who consider ministers as men who hold a brief for which they are paid. But a layman of character and influence who gives public testimony to his personal experience of the value of the liberal faith has in his favour the advantage of an unpaid agent, and an influence with these people which a minister does not possess. For those of our laity who have neither the taste for nor the gift of public speech there are other forms of service of the greatest value.

At least Be at the Service.

A form of service which all may render at little or no personal sacrifice is the simple and yet effective one of being in our places on a Sunday. Are the laity of the other Churches so lax in this matter as our own? Too many of our laity live up to the motto of the man who said: "Six days shalt thou labour, and on the seventh do all the odd jobs in the garden and the greenhouse." After all, the service is the centre of the life of the Church. It has been well said—"empty pews are enough to spoil a good sermon, while full pews make a poor one seem good—even keep the preacher from giving a poor one." Anyone accustomed to large public meetings can appreciate the story of the minister who thanked the Lord that he had a large congregation because he had not talent enough to speak to a small one.

Come with the Children.

We deplore the loss of so many of our young men and young women. This leakage is as much due to parental indifference and irregularity in church attendance as to any other cause. If we would awaken in our children love for our Church and its services, and train them "to revere every form natural and dear through which our Church's inner and unseen life expresses itself," they must not simply be sent to the Sunday-school, but be brought by their parents to our services. The habit of worship must be formed. The habit of family worship in the church must be restored.

Mistaken Ideas of Liberty.

The noted indifference of our laity in regard to regular attendance at church is largely due to mistaken ideas of liberty. Too many of them seem to think that Religious Freedom is an end in itself, and have become slaves to the notion of their own liberty. "It is a very fine thing," said Matthew Arnold, "to secure a free stage and no favour; but, after all, the part you play on that stage will have to be criticised." It is a very fine thing to have secured a free Church and no favour; but, after all, the part we play in and for that Church will have to be criticised. Liberty is not an end in itself; it is rather an essential to well-being than actual well-being itself. It is only a means to an end. It is the necessary condition of successful work. It gives a greater opportunity and thus creates new and sterner obligations. "Whoso looketh into the perfect law of liberty and continueth therein, he being not a forgetful hearer, but a doer of the work, that man is blessed in his deed."

Public Work and Service of the Church.

Sometimes our laity excuse their denominational ignorance and apathy on the plea of their public services. That service, they tell us, is practical Unitarianism; thus they are town-councillors first and Unitarians afterwards. As a working Church force they are practically lost to us. Their denomination or Church has become of secondary importance, or is forgotten altogether. Some years ago a Roman Catholic nobleman said that he was first a Catholic and then an Englishman. The statement shocks us because it leaves us in doubt as to his allegiance: whether it would be Rome first, or home first. If, however, one said that he was a Unitarian first and then an Englishman, it would only mean to us that he was in every sense a better Englishman. We have always held that Unitarianism meant better books, better music, better sanitation, better health and life; less drunkenness, more purity and better government. And we rejoice at what our laity have done in these directions—at the part they have taken in public and civic life. But surely the Church that has always fostered these ideals has a claim upon the loyalty of those who have been helped by it to become what they are. The names of many of our laity are among the most illustrious of the kingdom; they are household words to the public, representing every manner of good work; but for reasons easily explained they are not known as belonging to our household of faith.

What an impetus would be given to our work, what a help and inspiration it would be to our young people if all such men and women were more than mere nominal Unitarians, and were actively associated with us in our Church and denominational life. And inasmuch as the greater includes the less, their public life would be more and fuller through such association.

See to the Children.

Again. What a responsibility rests upon all of us to-day in regard to the training of our children in our own particular principles and faith. The great educational struggle of to-day, in which we see a most determined attempt to capture the children in the interests of denominationalism, should awaken us to this responsibility as nothing else has done.

What are we doing to mould and influence our children in the direction of the truth as it appears to us? Not to wish to bias their minds and leave them free to think for themselves is to leave them free to be biased by other people, and to be influenced by a way of thinking which we do not believe to be true. Go round in your Sunday-schools, as I have done, and ask the boys and girls who are going to the day-schools what they know of the Church catechism, and then to tell you something about Unitarianism. Some of you would get a shock. You would then see how true it is that if we do not do this work in our way, others will do it for us in their way.

To say that our Sunday-schools exist to do this work is not a sufficient answer. Much can be, and, I am glad to say, is done there. But all our children are not in the Sunday-school. After an experience of Sunday-school teaching, extending to twenty-nine years without a break except for my annual holiday, I am more than ever convinced that this work cannot be effectually done without the earnest co-operation of parents. The two Associations meeting in conference here have been alive to the importance of this work, and are ready with a supply of cheap and helpful literature, from which our young people may learn not only what our Unitarian faith is, but also what it has cost, and come to love it for its heritage of noble names. But without the co-operation of parents and the influence of home we are almost helpless.

Manifest the True Life.

Friends, our Unitarianism does not now so much need to be battled for as to be manifested. It is not manifested by sitting still and singing:—

> Truth, crushed to earth shall rise again;
> The eternal years of God are hers.

That is only true in so far as we work with God for it. We see truth crushed to earth at the polls, and everywhere else, by sheer weight of numbers. It never rises again unless men work for it and are determined that it shall. It is not enough to have a faith that we merely admire. We have got to justify it by our works. Emerson says that while there is nothing which Englishmen hate so much as a theory, they will bow down and worship a fact. We have got a beautiful theory, the truth as we think, and we may go on talking about it for ever without exciting general attention or concern. For what cares organised orthodoxy for disorganised liberalism? But embody that theory or truth in a fact—in a powerful organisation or a powerful Church—and the case is at once very different. A different attitude is assumed towards us. Our organisation or Church is seen to be a force in the community, it has to be reckoned with, to be taken into account. We are no longer left out in the cold.

I know something of those difficulties and hindrances which are peculiar to us. We can face them, and in doing so shall find the satisfaction that is always the reward of those who feel—

> Then to side with truth is noble, when we > share her wretched crust,
> Ere her cause bring fame and profit, and 'tis > prosperous to be just.

I appeal, then, in confidence to our laity to give more of their time, energy, money and sympathy to carry on this great work God has given to do; nay, not to the laity only, all—ministers, laymen, men, women and children—must actively co-operate in discharging our obligations to our church, to the community in which we live, to our country, and to the world.

> Then, in such hour of need
> Of your fainting, dispirited race,
> Ye, like angels, appear,
> Radiant with ardour divine!

Beacons of hope, ye appear!
Languor is not in your heart,
Weakness is not in your word,
Weariness not on your brow.
Ye alight in our van! at your voice,
Panic, despair, flee away.
Ye move through the ranks, recall
The stragglers, refresh the outworn,
Praise, reinspire the brave!
Order, courage, return;
Eyes rekindling, and prayers
Follow your steps as ye go;
Ye fill up the gaps in our files,
Strengthen the wavering line,
'Stablish, continue our march,
On to the bound of the waste,
On, to the city of God.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

SCOTLAND.

The Leavening of Scottish Theological Meal.

There are many signs of the working of a critical and æsthetic leaven in the Scottish sects. It is steadily producing a new bread and sustaining a new taste. The cake of Calvin's baking is distasteful, and the meal in the "girnel" of the Kirk comes from another mill than his. The wail of the Covenanting few is heard:—"Our fathers did eat the Catechism and are dead; who will bake the old cakes again that we and our children may live?"

The Unitarian, looking on, sees the fulfilment of the parable, "Two shall be grinding at the mill; one shall be taken, the other left." Calvin is taken and Moffat is left!

The founders of the Unitarian Churches in Scotland were true to the deeper faith of the national intellect when they based them on open-mindedness. Their prophetic action is fully justified by all the development that has come since. The various bodies into which dissent split off from the Established Church are witnesses to the verity of the basis of the Unitarian Churches—the right of private judgment in matters pertaining to religion.

Though the differences of the sects are not on the "Substance of the faith," and many of them are finical, they manifest an instinct of individual freedom and a religious earnestness on behalf of truth.

The two great Presbyterian sects, by the drift of thought, have come up to the position regarding the Bible from which the pioneers of Unitarianism started. The leading critics have all parted from the old moorings of infallibility and are in full sail before the wind of inquiry.

The "Independents," representing the more thorough dissent, and being professedly creedless, show remarkable signs of leaven. The Rev. J. Guinness Rogers, in his article on "Dissent in the Victorian Era" (Nineteenth Century and After, Vol. 50, p. 120), said:—

> Calvinism of a pronounced and sometimes a very severe and repellant type was then (at the beginning of Victoria's reign) prevalent among Congregationalists. In this respect there has been a marked change. Owing largely to the influence of a few enlightened men . . . the theology of Congregationalism has been greatly broadened.

The change in Scotland is so great that one wonders what the shades of the Haldanes would say to it.

The history of Scottish Independency is a virtual vindication of the position taken up and of the work done by the Unitarian Churches in Scotland. Last month the Scottish Congregational Union met in Glasgow, and its meetings serve to show us how the principles we hold look in other Churches under other names. The chairman, Dr. Fairbairn, made the Independent position evident when he said:—"He would as little tolerate any dictation with his conscience, any intermeddling with his reason by that assembly as by the English State." That individualistic position is the extremest Nonconformity. The chairman of the Union not only shook off the Establishment but bade the Union itself stand clear from the individual conscience. No Unitarian ever claimed more liberty than he did for himself and his fellow-independents, and he made it clear that he spoke as a Scotchman and for Scotchmen. "He could not forget that every principle which had shaped his life and formed his mind was learned in Scotland."

But Dr. Stark, in his paper on "Historical points of contact between English and Scottish Congregationalism," showed how such a claim for personal liberty had been treated in Scotland by Presbyterians. He told the story of Presbyterial contumely poured out on the Independents, how Presbytery and Assembly uttered "intermittent growls" and passed acts "condemning the errors of Independency and separation spreading as a gangrene and daily eating as a canker."

He rehearsed the fact that English Congregationalists had a very considerable hand in giving shape to Independency in Scotland. "English Nonconformist students attending Scottish Universities, denied the privileges at home which they had here, rendered valiant service to the rising Churches."

All that is parallel with the history of Unitarianism in Scotland. The "intermittent growls" were more frequent at the Unitarian, and there were not lacking accompaniments worse than opprobrious sounds. Indeed, even from Congregationalism itself the growls against Unitarians issued. Forgetting its own sufferings, Independency turned upon its fellow heretic and railed hotly. Was not the bitterest attack on Scottish Unitarianism led by Ralph Wardlaw? It added to the Glasgow Church, though it was designed to scatter it.

In reading of the valiant service done to rising Independent bodies by English students one is reminded of what Lant Carpenter and others did for our rising societies.

But "Scottish Independency," says Dr. Stark, "was entirely a spontaneous and indigenous product." So was Scottish Unitarianism. It, too, "came into existence through the force of providentially ordered circumstances, and the reverent study of God's word." In speaking of the origin of Scottish Independency, Dr. Stark unwittingly indicated that of Scottish Unitarianism as well. We had not our native apostles of the Haldane type, but the pioneer work of Richard Wright and George Harris was quite as full of apostolic fervour as the Evangelism of the Haldanes, while it was much more rational.

The main difference between the Independents and the Unitarians was the use they made of their freedom. The early Independents interpreted Christianity on the lines of Calvin: the Unitarians sought for Christ's own teaching. To the Unitarian the idea of God's Fatherhood—the most central and vital idea in the teaching of Jesus—became the the interpretive principle in theology and the ground of religious emotions.

It was to him the essential truth of Christianity, and he held to it with all his might. He made the idea his own and proclaimed it long before it was named by orthodox theologians. In what was termed "Evangelical preaching" among Independents, as with others, Fatherhood never occurred. The speech was of "Deity offended," and of substitutionary refuge from His reprobative wrath. The idea of God's Fatherhood still represents the real line of cleavage between Unitarians and all other Scottish sects. The division is not caused by diverse conceptions of Jesus or of the Bible, but really by different conceptions of God.

It is actually upon the definition and application of the Divine Fatherhood that the separation turns. The Unitarian universalises the idea, humanises and naturalises it; makes it the heart of his Theism and gathers from Science the substance of its body. To the Unitarian belongs the honour of being the first to proclaim, in gracious fulness, the idea of God's Fatherhood to Scotchmen. Other bodies have since taken up the idea, but they hold it with limitations which vitiate it. It is around this idea that the final struggle of Theology will take place. To it all controversies regarding the Messiah, the Gospels, &c., are subordinate. Up to that last battle-ground the Scottish mind must come.

In their "Study of God's Word" the early Scottish Unitarians divined that "the books of the New Testament reflect in each case the circumstances and ideas of the writers." Though they were not critics, they had the courage of their divination, and declined the tradition of inerrancy. Now, the Scottish Congregationalists are showing a similar courage. In a paper read at the recent meeting of their Union it was declared that modern criticism "made it impossible for them to find in the Bible the supreme and unquestioned religious guide which their fathers and mothers found." The speaker also affirmed that one of the great needs of to-day is a theology based on the positive results of Biblical criticism. When such a theology is presented by Congregationalists, will it differ much from that voiced by Dr. Martineau?

The limitations of Congregationalism are as evident as its liberties. In his article on Dissent, Mr. Rogers never once hinted at the existence of Unitarians. No fellowship with Unitarians is the rule under which, with few exceptions, Congregationalists in Scotland have always acted. Indeed, all the while, Congregationalism has been straitened in itself. It has directly suppressed theological freedom within its own borders. It virtually cast out the Rev. James Cranbrook, and gagged lesser men by the threat (sometimes executed) of the withdrawal of a grant on account of advanced preaching. All Scottish Congregational pulpits were not open to Dr. John Hunter.

What is the moral of all this for us? We need not let it give us a "good conceit of ourselves," but we may take it as a vindication of the position which we have held from the first. The whole trend of progressive thought is towards the position of open-mindedness. What the further approach to that position may bring the mind to regarding the objects of religious concern is not the vital consideration, but the position itself. Each type of mind will take naturally to the view which it is fitted to realise. The main thing is the sympathy which should permeate all minds in their endeavour to be truly reflective of the infinite realities. But why should the Unitarian be any longer regarded as a heretic? Is not his heresy common to all open minds? Why should he be singled out as a profane person peculiarly dangerous as a teacher? The other evening, at a meeting in Aberdeen of Free Churchmen, the Rev. William Clow said he "would not permit a Unitarian to teach his child." The utterance is an evidence of the way in which Unitarians are regarded by the orthodox. It means ecclesiastically "No Quarter." But we can afford to smile at it, knowing how the leaven works.

We may also possess our souls in patience in view of the slur pronounced by the editor of the British Weekly in his review of the first number of The Hibbert Journal. Referring to the views represented by the Journal, he said:—"It is impossible not to think of the result of these views on the Churches that have more or less accepted them. What is the state of the Unitarian Churches? Can anyone doubt that if the predominant phase of thought in this view were to prevail it would lay waste the whole organisation of Christianity in this country? There are without doubt killing forms of faith, forms of faith that slay the Christian consciousness and the Christian energy." The one thing about which we have to be concerned is the truth of the views credited with such wasting power. If they are true, all fear of their alleged killing influence may be dropped. "W. R. N." confounds the dogmatic consciousness with the Christian consciousness. The first is certainly in danger from the prevailing critical views: the latter is in none. For the real Christian consciousness and energy the Unitarian is as seriously concerned as anyone.

After this lengthened survey of the "measures of meal" undergoing leavening, a word or two is due to our Corner. All our churches are manned, and busy on the borders of winter work. St. Vincent-street Church, Glasgow, has introduced the electric light and otherwise felt the renovator's touch. The Kirkcaldy Church has heartily welcomed its new minister, and the Kilmarnock brethren are rallying hopefully under their fresh leader. There is liveliness in the Dundee Church, and some stir in St. Mark's Chapel, Edinburgh. The South St. Mungo-street congregation, Glasgow, holds on its way bravely. The Aberdeen congregation is preparing actively for the great Christmas bazaar in aid of the building fund of the new church, and looking wistfully forward to the laying of the foundation-stone of the projected buildings. Not yet is the "whole lump" leavened. It is enough for the leaven to preserve its power of permeation and invigoration.

A CAUTION.

Sir,—A man giving the name of G. H. Wood called on the Rev. E. D. Priestley Evans at Kidderminster last Friday, and presented a letter of recommendation purporting to have been given him by me. Mr. Evans at once saw that the letter was a forgery, as neither the handwriting nor the signature bore any resemblance to mine, with which, fortunately, Mr. Evans is familiar; he at once took possession of it and sent it to me. I know no man of the name mentioned in the letter, nor have I given a recommendation to any man out of work. I need scarcely say that the man has disappeared. It is quite likely that this person is making use of other names beside mine, so I advise my brethren to be on their guard and not to accept even a written recommendation without verifying it by referring to the alleged writer.

Walter Lloyd.

Gloucester, Oct. 21.

We hear with the utmost satisfaction of the success of the first number of the Hibbert Journal. Within a few days of publication the whole of the first edition was disposed of, and a second edition has been printed. This is most encouraging evidence of a widespread interest among thoughtful people of every religious connection. Have the members of our own churches realised the opportunity that is open to them of sustaining an admirable work in the interest of free religious thought and higher scholarship?

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Harvest Thanksgiving Services.

Belfast: Mountpottinger (Oct. 5).—Preacher, the Rev. W. J. Davies. On the two following Wednesdays the Bands of Mercy and Hope began their winter sessions.

Malton.—Preacher, the Rev. W. Rodger Smyth, followed on Monday by a lecture on "Richard Jefferies: lover of Nature," by the Rev. H. Rawlings.

Pantdefaid and Llandyssul.—On Sunday, Monday, and Tuesday.—Preachers, the Revs. W. Tudor Jones and David Evans.

Pontypridd (Oct. 12).—Combined with Anniversary Services.—Preacher, the Rev. Dr. Griffiths, of Ilkeston.

Stannington (Oct. 12).—Afternoon preacher, the Rev. A. H. Dolphin; morning, the Rev. Iden Payne. On the following evening, a service of song, "Farmer Forest's Thanksgiving."

Whitchurch (Oct. 12).—Preacher, the Rev. C. D. Badland. On the following Wednesday, the Rev. E. A. Voysey was the preacher at the first special service, arranged by the M.C.U.

Accrington.—On Sunday last the chapel anniversary services were conducted by the Rev. T. P. Spedding, who gave a helpful address to the scholars in the morning, and preached afternoon and evening. There was a large congregation present in the evening to listen to the sermon on "The Comfort of Unitarianism." Anthems were sung at all services.

Birmingham: Church of the Messiah Sunday Schools and Home Mission.—The annual services in connection with these institutions were held on Sunday, Oct. 12, when, in the unavoidable absence through illness of the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, two sermons were preached by the Rev. A. R. Andreae, of Gee Cross, to good congregations. The collection was the largest for several years. On Monday, Oct. 13, the annual meeting of subscribers and friends was held, Mr. Herbert New in the chair, about 200 persons being present. The reports on the work of the schools recorded a satisfactory year's work. The financial statement, read by the hon. treasurer, Mr. T. W. Ryland, showed expenditure exceeding the income, and he appealed for new and increased subscriptions. Mr. W. J. B. Tranter (Home Missionary) read a most interesting report, showing the importance and immense variety of his work; he had made 2,500 visits during the year. On the proposition of Mr. W. E. Kenrick, the best thanks of the meeting were given Mr. Andreae for conducting the services. The Rev. L. P. Jacks read a letter from the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, conveying to the meeting his expression of extreme regret at not being able to fulfil his engagement, and wishing the schools and mission a prosperous future. Mr. Jacks, in proposing the vote of thanks to superintendents, teachers, and officers, called attention to the shortness of teachers in the Girls' Morning School and Boys' Afternoon School, and appealed for the necessary help in these departments. Miss M. Dowson, who had resigned the superintendentship of the Afternoon Girls' School, having held that post six years, Mr. Jacks, on behalf of the teachers and some of the elder girls, presented to her three volumes of Stopford Brooke's works, with a letter of grateful acknowledgment for her helpful services. The hearty thanks of the meeting to Mr. New for presiding brought the proceedings to a close.

Darlington.—At a meeting of the Teeside Committee of the N. and D.U.C.A. on Friday, Oct. 17, a resolution protesting against the Education Bill, as opposed to the interests both of education and religious equality, was unanimously passed. Last Sunday the congregation of the Unitarian Church, with one dissentient, also passed a similar resolution.

Derby.—At the meeting of the North Midland Poor-Law Conference on Wednesday week, a paper on "Vagrancy and the Casual Ward" was read by the Rev. John Birks, the second of two papers, which were followed by discussion.

Liverpool Sunday School Society.—The first meeting of the session took place on Thursday, Oct. 16, when a service was held in the Hamilton-road Church. There was a large attendance of teachers from the affiliated schools, the Ancient Chapel, Bond-street, Bootle, Garston, Gateacre, Hamilton-road, Hope-street, Liscard, Mill-street, and Warrington Sunday-schools all being represented. The service was conducted by the Rev. J. L. Haigh, the sermon being preached by the Rev. E. W. Lummis (Warrington), who, in the course of his very helpful address, said that the Education question seemed to be the one thing about which all classes of people were concerned at present, but he did not think that education itself was the object after which they were all striving. He showed what education really was, and how the education of children was not a thing to be accomplished in a short time, but must be continued throughout their growing years. The three great essentials in educating the young were Goodness, Character, and Influence, by means of which the teachers might help to purify and strengthen the lives of their scholars. After the service a social meeting was held in the schoolroom, by the kind invitation of the minister and congregation, refreshments and music being provided. A very hearty vote of thanks, proposed by Mr. Frederick Robinson (President), and seconded by the Rev. J. Crowther Hirst, was given to Mr. Lummis for his beautiful and helpful address, and a vote of thanks to the Hamilton-road congregation for their kind hospitality brought to a close a very successful meeting.

London: Forest Gate.—Anniversary services were held on Sunday last, when the new minister-at-large for the London district, the Rev. J. H. Wicksteed, M.A., preached two interesting sermons, the topics being "Cosmical Kindness" and "A Heroic Boy in the Bible." On Sunday evening next Mr. Perris will open a series of short studies of Dante's "Divine Comedy," contrasting mediæval and modern methods of illustrating and enforcing religious truth. The Upton-lane Literary and Social Union has inaugurated an active and varied sessional course. A Jumble Sale, held last week, was attended by many poor East-enders, and realised nearly £6.

London: Stepney (Appointment).—Mr. C. A. Ginever has received and accepted a unanimous invitation to occupy the pulpit of College Chapel. The excellent work done by Mr. Ginever at Walthamstow some time since encourages the congregation to hope much from his settlement amongst them.

North Cheshire Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The annual meeting was held at Stockport on Saturday last, and was attended by about 110 persons. After tea Mr. E. B. Broadrick, the retiring President, occupied the chair, supported by the Revs. B. C. Constable and W. C. Hall, and

Mr. A. Slater. Other ministers present included the Revs. W. L. Tucker, W. Harrison, N. Green, J. A. Pearson, C. E. Oliver, and A. R. Andreae, and representatives were present from most of the fourteen schools in the Union. The reports of the treasurer and secretary were read and adopted, and the officers for the ensuing year elected as follows:—President: The Rev. H. S. Tayler, M.A.; Vice-President: Mr. W. Lawton; Treasurer: Mr. S. Ashworth; Hon. Secretary: Mr. A. Slater. Miss Hirst, of Stockport, who has been a Sunday-school teacher for over fifty years, read a most interesting paper, entitled "Hints and Reminiscences," after which the Rev. W. C. Hall introduced for discussion, "Shall our Schools be Represented at our Bazaar?" The bazaar referred to was the East Cheshire Christian Union Bazaar, which hopes to raise £5,000, and with the churches forming which almost all the schools are affiliated. A good discussion followed, and finally it was decided that the schools should assist, with a view of having one day for a Children's Opening, by means of scholars' subscriptions throughout the schools of the Union. The meeting closed with hymn and benediction shortly before nine o'clock.

Rhondda Valley: South Wales.—The open-air meetings inaugurated in the summer of 1900 by the Rev. Dr. Griffiths, then of Pontypridd, and the Rev. David Rees, Rhondda, were continued this summer again. The speakers were the Revs. D. Rees, Hugh Robinson (late Baptist minister), Abercynon; Messrs. T. Dalton Rees, Thomas Edwards, Simon Jones, B.A., and others, while a good number of our people did excellent service by distributing English literature, and the sale of Welsh pamphlets. The place and number of meetings were as follows:—Ferndale, six meetings; Ynysybwl, three; Penygraig, six; Treherbert, four; Tonyrefail, six; Tonypandy, three. The average attendance would be about 130. There was an eager demand for the English literature supplied by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and pamphlets in the ancient Kymric tongue sold well. In each town and village where the meetings were held the interest aroused has been considerable, especially among the young people. At one of the villages the interest grew so intense that the guardians of orthodoxy thought it their duty to bring pressure to bear on the police authorities to put a stop to the meetings, and it was done. But after a little insistence upon the rights and privileges common to all religious bodies, the meetings were again allowed to proceed. It is to be hoped that by this means some seeds of Liberal Christian thought have been sown in the fields of religious public opinion.

Sheffield: Upperthorpe.—A meeting to welcome the Rev. A. H. Dolphin to the ministry of Upperthorpe Chapel was held on Monday evening. After tea and a recital by Mr. Stevenson on the newly-improved and augmented organ, the meeting took place in the schoolroom, which was filled with members of the congregation and friends from Upper Chapel and neighbourhood. Mr. I. B. Wostenholm occupied the chair, and on the platform were the Revs. J. J. Wright, George Knight, Charles Peach, John Ellis, and W. Stephens, Councillor Harry Fisher, and Mr. W. G. Guest. Letters of regret for absence were read from the Revs. Charles Hargroves, W. Blazeby, M. Evans, and H. Thomas, Mr. A. J. Hobson (Master Cutler), Mr. M. J. Hunter, and others. Also a friendly letter from the Rev. T. N. Holmes, neighbouring Congregational minister, expressing regret that illness prevented him from being present to welcome Mr. Dolphin, as he had done Mr. Peach and Mr. Ellis, his predecessors. The Chairman, on behalf of the trustees, and Mr. Guest and Mr. Blackwell for the congregation and Sunday-school, gave a hearty welcome to Mr. Dolphin. Mr. Wright spoke of Mr. Dolphin's good work in Lancashire, and Mr. Knight, Mr. Peach, and Mr. Ellis joining in the welcome, recalled happy memories of their own connection with Upperthorpe as former ministers. Mr. Dolphin, in his reply, asked for loyal co-operation in the work which he hoped to accomplish.

South-East Wales Unitarian Society.—The quarterly meeting was held at Pontypridd on Monday, Oct. 13. Mr. John Lewis extended a welcome to the Society on behalf of the local congregation, and at the same time offered the hearty welcome of the Society to the new President, Lieut.-Colonel Thomas Phillips, on taking the chair for the first time. There were also present the Revs. W. J. Phillips, J. T. Davis, David Rees, and Fisher Short; Messrs. G. Carslake Thompson, G. L. Thomas, L. N. Williams (treasurer), Edgar Hammett, and G. F. Hacker, and delegates from the various churches. Reports were received from various churches showing that steady work is being accomplished. Arrangements were made to continue the services at Bridgend Chapel, and it is to be hoped that ultimately it will be possible to appoint an energetic minister in that town with a view to re-establishing the congregation on a firm footing. At seven o'clock a public meeting was held, when the President extended a hearty welcome on behalf of the Society to the Rev. Fisher Short, the new minister at Aberdare. The Rev. Dr. Griffiths (late of Pontypridd, now of Ilkeston) delivered an address on "Heresies and Heretics," and the Rev. Fisher Short on "Our Indebtedness to Heretics."

South Shields.—By the death of Mr. W. Newlands, the congregation has lost one of its original members, for many years treasurer of the Sunday-school, a loyal friend, well known to the churches of the district. A memorial service was conducted last Sunday by Mr. Thomas Paxton.

Trebanos: South Wales.—The half-yearly preaching meetings were held last Sunday and Monday, when the Revs. Lewis Williams (Rhydygwin) and E. O. Jenkins (Llwyn) officiated. The Rev. J. R. Price, Congregationalist, introduced the Sunday afternoon service. The services altogether were most helpful, and the offertories towards the debt of the chapel were satisfactory.

Yorkshire Unitarian Sunday School Union.—"What shall we Teach?" was the title of a paper read by the Rev. J. Morgan Whiteman, of Dewsbury, at a Teachers' Conference at Holbeck, Leeds, on Saturday last. The ideal of the paper was of so noble and lofty a character as to commend itself to every lover of children and every enthusiast in the grand work of instilling into the minds of the young the simple words, the holy and consistent life and character of Jesus Christ. Its more salient points were of such an encouraging and instructive nature as to make it especially welcome to teachers at a time when so much is being said in the present Education controversy as to the teaching of religion—real religion—in the place of confusing creeds and dogmas. The subsequent discussion was equally interesting, and at the close universal expressions of appreciation and gratitude were awarded Mr. Whiteman for his paper.

There is still a debt of nearly £1,100 upon the houses that have just been built, the rents of which will go towards the limited or proportional endowment; but whilst this debt remains the objects of the Subscribers cannot be fully realised. We therefore make a further Appeal to the generosity of our friends to place the finances of the Chapel upon a foundation which will render them independent of the grants which the British and Foreign Unitarian Association and the East Cheshire Christian Union have hitherto so generously given.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

WE shall publish next week the second of Mrs. Bosanquet's articles on questions of Social Economics, of which the subject will be "The Housing Question." A review of Mrs. Bosanquet's new book, "The Strength of the People," will be found on p. 692.

THE Rev. R. A. Armstrong, President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, was unfortunately prevented by illness from taking the chair at the meeting of the Council on Tuesday afternoon. For the last two Sundays Mr. Armstrong was unable to preach at Hope-street Church, and while we are glad to hear that he is making steady progress toward recovery, he is ordered to take complete rest for the present, and is now recruiting in the Isle of Man.

THE Royal Progress through the City last Saturday passed off to the satisfaction of all concerned. The address presented by the County Council in Trafalgar-square dwelt upon the great interest which the King had shown in questions of practical reform in London, and to this His Majesty replied :—

Your confidence that my favuor will be extended to every measure calculated to ameliorate the conditions of my subjects is well founded ; and of the numerous and important questions which come under your consideration none appeal more strongly to my interest and sympathy than those which regard directly the welfare of the poorer classes, especially in this and other great cities.

The address presented at the Guildhall was briefer and more exclusively of congratulation to the King, but the South London address again referred to the problems of City life, and the King's reply included the following passage :—

It is to us a source of much satisfaction to know that the many social problems which present themselves to those who are charged with the municipal government of the metropolis are receiving that attention which their importance demands, and you have our hearty sympathy in all your efforts to ameliorate the conditions under which large numbers of our people are compelled to live.

ON Sunday morning a service of Thanksgiving was held in St. Paul's Cathedral, and attended by the King and Queen—thanksgiving for the King's recovery and the happy completion of the Coronation. The sermon was preached by the Bishop of London, who recalled the fact that now for the second time the King attended such a service, having been twice brought back from the very gates of death. In this, he urged, there must be a solemn and divine purpose. "The life of a King must have been saved twice for kingly service, for a more perfect fulfilling of the famous motto Ich Dien, for the stability of a nation's life, for the greater happiness and prosperity of his subjects." Then, turning to the people, he declared that they must cherish the life twice saved, and be a people whom it uplifts a King to lead. Faith in God must be a more potent factor in their lives. Then, and then only, could that Thanksgiving be worthy of a Christian nation, and the gratitude they offered would bear some proportion to the Divine mercy.

THE announcement that Mr. Chamberlain is to go to South Africa, to study for himself the conditions left by the close of the war, has been received with very general satisfaction ; and we may take it as a happy augury that he is to sail with H.M.S. Good Hope. "One may well believe," says the Temps, "that Mr. Chamberlain intends not to serve a party or a faction but to work for the reconciliation of their hearts. He can do a great deal in that direction. His will be a glorious and beneficent intervention if he makes use of all his moral and political authority to bring the two races nearer together, to impose silence on enmity and rancour, and to make the consent of the peoples the basis of the supremacy established by force. In any case, this journey is an interesting innovation. The Mother-country has been accustomed to receive the visits of the Colonial statesmen and not to send governing statesmen to the Colonies. It is a fresh bond, a fresh step in the unity of the Empire."

"THE Churchmen's Union for the Advancement of Liberal Religious Thought" was inaugurated at the Church House, Westminster, Oct. 31, 1898, and has among its vice-presidents (surely the Bishop of Hereford should be President) Lord Avebury, Professor Henslow, and Dr. Rashdall. The objects of the Union are thus stated :—

1. To maintain the right and duty of the Church to restate her belief from time to time as required by the progressive revelation of the Holy Spirit.
2. To uphold the historic comprehensiveness and corporate life of the Church of England, and her Christian spirit of tolerance in all things non-essential.
3. To give all support in their power to those who are honestly and loyally endeavouring to vindicate the truths of Christianity by the light of scholarship and research, and while paying due regard to continuity, to work for such changes in the formularies and practices in the Church of England as from time to time are made necessary by the needs and knowledge of the day.
4. To assert the rights and duties of the laity as constituent members of the Body of Christ.
5. To encourage friendly relations between the Church of England and all other Christian bodies.

For the coming winter a series of public lectures has been arranged, and among the lecturers announced are Mrs. Humphry Ward, the Rev. W. R. Inge, Mr. T. Bailey Saunders (Harnack's champion), Mr. R. B. Haldane, M.P., and Dr. John Hunter, who, we understood, is to give the next lecture.

THE first lecture of the series was given by the Dean of Ripon on Wednesday afternoon, in an overcrowded room, opposite St. Martin's Church, Charing-cross, Dr. Robertson, of King's College, being in the chair. Dr. Fremantle's subject was "Natural Christianity," and the purpose of the lecture was to show that what is spiritual is in the highest sense natural, and that the Divine revelation and the redemptive work which culminated in Christ were but the perfecting of that natural order of the world and human life, in which the energy of the Eternal was for ever present. Modern Theists did not err in their direct teaching, but in their understanding of the person and the work of Christ ; they had no true insight into the redemptive power of sympathy, which wrought so wonderfully in him. The essential thing which every Christian must recognise was the moral supremacy of Christ. From the standpoint of faith in the immanence of God in the world, and the natural order of all spiritual processes, the Dean then touched upon the questions of the Virgin birth, miracles, the Incarnation, the Atonement and other doctrines, eliminating "miracle" by reasonable interpretation, and pointing out how each doctrine could be so stated as to take its place in the natural order of the spiritual world. In the audience there was clearly a strong division of sympathies, the orthodox protest finding expression in the brief discussion which followed the lecture, when one speaker pertinently asked the Dean how the teaching he had presented differed from that of the Unitarians. Professor Henslow, on the other hand, quoted Mr. Conybeare's article in the Hibbert Journal, as cutting away the ground from under the doctrine of the Virgin birth, a doctrine which the Dean had urged should be left an open question in the Church of England.

THE discussions in Parliament on the Education Bill have been confined this week to Clause 8, and chiefly to Section (1) of that clause. Mr. Balfour has repeatedly said that this clause contains the vital principle of the Bill, which is to preserve the denominational character of the denominational schools. It is in vain that clear-headed members point out the certainty of future troubles arising from the complex system of government set up by the Bill. Equally in vain is the appeal that the teachers shall be freed from the odious pressure put on them to comply with theological tests in order to secure the professional advantages to which their fitness to teach entitles them. It is true that with regard to assistants and pupil-teachers it has been agreed that they "may" be appointed "without reference to religious creed or denomination"; but the sturdy resistance offered to the proposal that the word "shall" should be substituted for "may" shows how small a concession is really contemplated in the admission of this amendment. Meanwhile, the case for the head-teachers is unaffected, and the principle of the Bill is still one that is unfair to a noble profession, and but too certain to be vicious in effect. In order to become a head-teacher a candidate must comply with denominational requirements. Who can doubt that a severe strain will be put on many a conscience by this provision? Apparently, however, the clergy and their friends have become so inured to a system which keeps the pulpits filled with pretended believers in the articles and creeds that a similar pressure brought to bear on schoolmasters and mistresses is regarded with indifference.

IN the course of the debates some very instructive cases have been cited showing to what lengths the clerical managers of denominational schools have gone in requiring services from the schoolmaster which are really functions of a church officer. No doubt it is extremely convenient to get the assistance of a competent organist and Sunday-school superintendent thrown in with the duties discharged as day-school teacher. No doubt, also, extremely good service can be rendered, and is being rendered by persons appointed under the present system. It would be, we imagine, a serious thing for many a village if the schoolmaster were suddenly withdrawn from all such subministerial duties. But no one proposes to prevent a master from continuing such services if he likes; what is desirable is that he shall not be excluded from the day-school work solely on the ground that he prefers not to act as a subaltern of the vicar. An amendment to secure candidates from hardship in this matter was amongst those received with most favour by members on both sides; but on the suggestion of Sir John Gorst it was put aside with the promise that the relief sought should be given by stipulations to be embodied in the Code next year.

IT would be tedious to attempt to thread together the more or less dubious promises, hints and assurances which have been thrown out by Mr. Balfour, Sir William Anson and other Government speakers as the debate has gone on. We are told this and that will be done, or considered by-and-by; meanwhile the spirit and extent of the "concessions" granted by the Prime Minister may be best judged by studying the additions which have been made to Clause 8 since we wrote last week. We then printed the Clause as originally drafted, and also Section (1) and part of sub-section (a) as passed up to the time of writing. To this sub-section the following has been added, with regard to the directions of the local authority to managers:—

Including any directions with respect to the number and educational qualification of teachers to be emplcyed for such instruction, and with respect to the dismissal of any teacher on educational grounds; and if the managers fail to carry out such directions the local authority shall, in addition to their other powers, have power themselves to carry out the directions in question as if they were the managers.

In (b) the phrase as to audit is omitted, being otherwise provided for. To (c), as to consent of local authority to appointment of teachers, the following addition is made:—

And the consent of the authority shall also be required to the dismissal of a teacher unless the dismissal be on grounds connected with the giving of religious instruction in the school; provided that assistant-teachers and pupil-teachers may be appointed without reference to religious creed or denomination.

The amended form of (d) is as follows:—

(d) The managers of the schools shall provide the school-house free of any charge except for the teachers' dwelling-house, if any, to the local education authority for use as a public elementary school, and also for other educational purposes if the local education authority have no other suitable accommodation in schools provided by them, but not more often than three days in the week, and shall, out of funds provided by them, keep the school-house in good repair, and make such alterations and improvements in the buildings as may be reasonably required by the local education authority.

In place of (e) withdrawn, because provided for in the amended Clause 7, a new subsection, dealing with the liability of managers and authority respectively for damage to furniture or the room, when used by either out of school hours, was added, and with the help of the closure, Section 1 was completed on Wednesday evening.

THE probabilities with regard to the Bill's passing have been much discussed, and opinion seems to be settling in the direction of an expected wholesale closure of amendments, and the passage of the Bill by "guillotined" compartments. If that is the course adopted there will certainly be bitter feelings of resentment on the part of Nonconformists and all who desire a truly national system of education.

A LEADING article in the Daily News of October 24 having deprecated the cheap re-issue, among other books, of Matthew Arnold's "Literature and Dogma," on the ground that "those who usually buy such reprints can hardly be expected to possess mental discipline or calmness of judgment necessary to appraise its reasoning at its true worth, though they are likely enough to be delighted with its raillery and ridicule," two letters of protest appeared in last Monday's issue. Mr. Reginald Statham bore witness to the great earnestness of Arnold's purpose in that book, and Mr. T. J. Hardy pointed out the weakness of such distrust of the people's judgment. The working classes, Mr. Hardy urges, from a wide personal experience, "are at least as capable of clear thinking, once they grapple with a subject, as persons able to pay three, six or twelve shillings for a book—specialists alone excluded." But as a matter of fact these sixpenny reprints mean a wider circulation among readers of all classes, and to deprecate such publications is dangerously like the interference of authority with free inquiry and the right of private judgment. "By all means," says Mr. Hardy, "let us cultivate mental discipline, let us introduce into our schools that study of evidence (not Christian evidence) which Mr. John Morley recommended years ago in his essay on culture."

Of no quality do we stand so much in need to-day as of trained common-sense. But at the same time let us welcome every effort that is made to sow broadcast the conclusions of earnest men on so urgent and vital a matter as religion. We need not fear for the people's religion on the score of freedom of thought; we have much to fear from that of convention. How incalculably would the interests of real religion be furthered if only the hearts of the people could be stirred to respond to the conclusion which you, Sir, say is the main contention of "Literature and Dogma":

"That the very soul of the Old Testament and also of the New Testament, in a sweeter and more comprehensive form, is the craving for righteousness, and the belief that the unseen power of the universe is on the side of righteousness!"

And there is more, much more, in "Literature and Dogma" than that. How much more, I, for one, hope that all your readers who have not yet done so will take an early opportunity of discovering.

THE valuable articles on "Professor Huxley as a Scientific and Philosophic Teacher," recently contributed to THE INQUIRER by Dr. G. Dawes Hicks, have been reprinted in pamphlet form, and copies may be had at the Book Room, Essex Hall, price 3d., or 4d. by post.

IT is announced that the new Wesleyan Hymn Book is expected to be ready for the meeting of Conference in 1903, and that a year later the Tune Book, to be specially prepared, will also be ready for publication. Of the latter, Sir J. Frederick Bridge, the organist of Westminster Abbey, has been appointed editor.

LITERATURE.

THE LIFE OF DR. MARTINEAU.*

OUR first word of thankfulness for this book was spoken last week. Its two substantial volumes offer a great wealth of interest in the full record of a life, wonderful in its length of years, in its transcendent gifts and profound and inspiring influence, and in the happy completeness to which its strenuous labours were brought. Our freshest memories are of a very beautiful old age, crowned with reverence and affection, brought to a peaceful ending more than two years ago. Now we are permitted to enter into a new intimacy with the mind and heart of our great Teacher, to follow the long course of his life, from its earliest years, to see the storm and stress, and something of the inward sources of that strength by which he had the victory. Now we shall gain fresh insight into the treasures of his published works, and this again will add to the depth of the impression made by the self-revelation of the intimate letters, which give to these volumes so much of their priceless worth.

We noted last week the division of labour by which Dr. Drummond undertook the whole work of the biography, while a separate study of Dr. Martineau's philosophy was left in Mr. Upton's hands. The present notice is concerned only with the biography, Mr. Upton's most interesting and helpful contribution remaining for future consideration.

Dr. Drummond's work fills the whole of the first and half of the second volume, amounting altogether to 700 pages. Of this he writes in the Preface :—

> When I was asked by the family of the late Dr. Martineau to write the purely biographical portion of the composite work which is here presented in its completeness, it was with considerable trepidation that I undertook a task for which I was conscious of no special aptitude, but which I at once felt it to be impossible to decline. With the aid of material abundantly supplied or carefully collected, both in print and manuscript, I have constructed a tale unadorned except by inserted fragments of writing from the pen of Dr. Martineau, and can claim no higher merit than presenting to the reader the leading facts of a busy and noble life with clearness and accuracy.
> I have not thought it the duty of a biographer to express his own sentiments or opinions, and have aimed only at producing a true narrative, leaving to others the work of analysis and criticism. The name of James Martineau has been with me a household word since my childhood. The spiritual character of his thought fascinated me at an early period ; and when I became his pupil, I admired and revered him with all the ardour of opening manhood. And if, yielding to his own lessons of independent judgment, I have been unable to follow him in all his conclusions, or if in my descriptions I have endeavoured to suppress all personal feeling, this cannot alter the reverence, gratitude and love with which he must ever dwell in my memory.

What Dr. Drummond here says of his purpose, he has amply fulfilled. Indeed, if we have a fear, it is that for the general reader this record may be found too complete, and that in the wealth of material for a picture of Dr. Martineau's life thus gathered together with devoted care, a clear outline may not readily emerge. Yet there is not a page for which we are not grateful, and if anyone does not wish, for instance, to read the twenty pages of smaller type devoted to an account of the unpublished sermons on the Christianity of Paul (referred to in the preface of the "Endeavours"), and to some notes on early lectures on the Gospels, it is easy to pass on.

Dr. Drummond refers in his preface to a series of "Biographical Memoranda," written by Dr. Martineau to assist his friend, the Rev. Charles Wicksteed, in the preparation of the memoir published in 1877 in Cassell's "National Portrait Gallery." From these memoranda a number of most interesting passages are embodied in the biography, amounting altogether to not less than thirty pages, and if these are added to Dr. Martineau's letters, quoted in the course of the narrative or appended to successive chapters, it appears that of the 700 pages of the biography some 300 are of Dr. Martineau's own writing. This is a great gift now offered to us all, out of the still more abundant store, "the great mass of letters" of which Dr. Drummond speaks in the preface, in which, throughout his long life, writing to many friends, and to unknown correspondents who sought his help, Dr. Martineau, with a rare generosity, poured out so much of his mind and opened his heart.

Dr. Drummond divides the biography into nine chapters, three devoted to Martineau's childhood and education, and his first ministry in Dublin (which closed when he was twenty-seven years of age), three to the twenty-five years of his ministry in Liverpool, with the interval of fifteen months in Germany, and the last three to the forty-two years of London life, with latterly twenty-two summers in the Scottish home at Aviemore.

The earlier chapters furnish many delightful glimpses of Martineau's home surroundings and college life, and while making use of Harriet Martineau's autobiography, Dr. Drummond appears to us to have dealt with perfect judgment and great delicacy of feeling with the questions there raised as to Mrs. Martineau's disposition, as later also with the painful subject of Harriet Martineau's alienation from her brother. It helps one to realise how far back this story goes when we read of visits to the Martineaus in their Norwich home of Mrs. Barbauld, who was born in 1743 ; and James Martineau, while he was a student at York, on a visit to London called upon her at Newington Green, where he saw also Sir James Mackintosh and Samuel Rogers. Fifty years afterwards he recalled the old lady's gracious kindness and vivacity, and told how he amused her by trying to translate some sentences of a Greek newspaper, which Byron had sent to Rogers, and he had left with Mrs. Barbauld.

We must not attempt here even the briefest sketch of this long life, the story of which Dr. Drummond has so completely told. Outwardly it was not striking in incident, but, on the other hand, inwardly it is throughout of intense interest. One traces the growth of thought, the marvellous activity, and recognises from the first the ruling spirit of the finest conscientiousness, and a strenuous eagerness in the constant use of noble gifts, while admiration and reverence for a great personality increase with the maturing years.

For two years Martineau had been at Dr. Lant Carpenter's school at Bristol, and had a year of apprenticeship to a mechanical engineer at Derby, but then, as a youth of seventeen, determined to devote himself to the Christian ministry, and went through the five years' course of study at Manchester College, then at York. Thus he was twenty-two when he left college and entered on his life's work, first for a year as a teacher in Dr. Carpenter's school, where formerly he was a pupil, and then in the ministry, with which from the first he combined a large amount of teaching, both private and public. For forty-five years he was a professor in his old college, and latterly principal, going over from Liverpool to lecture while the college was in Manchester (removed there from York in 1840), and in 1857 following the college to London. For a long course of years, in addition to all this, he did a great deal of writing for reviews, and even then his manifold activity was far from exhausted, while his great books, completed and published after he was eighty years of age, were the ripened fruits, not of genius alone, but of all those years of unsparing labour. Enthusiasm as a teacher and a most strenuous and conscientious diligence marked him from the first, and it is marvellous to see how much he was able to accomplish.

His first ministry at Dublin came to an abrupt end, and at great personal sacrifice, because he would not accept the Regium Donum, and thus take his share in the State endowment of sectarian religion. Then as his ministry in Liverpool and his writings began to command a wide attention, his brilliant advocacy of a spiritual view of religion, depending on the inward witness rather than on the old external sanctions, appeared to many of the Unitarians of that day dangerous heresy, and distrust culminated in an acute controversy over his appointment to an enlarged professorship in Manchester New College in 1857. Another controversy arose when he applied for the chair of mental philosophy at University College, London, when the opposite forces of orthodoxy and secularism united to prevent his appointment. These and other matters are fully related, and largely through the help of Dr. Martineau's memoranda and letters, while other more private experiences, such as the touching death of his boy Herbert, in the early Liverpool years, and Mrs. Martineau's death in 1877, admit one into the sanctuary of the tenderest and deepest feelings.

The account of the German residence is delightful, and there are many lighter touches, some of which we shall hardly refrain from reproducing in a subsequent notice, but here our first extract shall be from an early letter to one of Dr. Martineau's American correspondents, the Rev. Orville Dewey. It was in 1846, in reply to a letter of sympathy after the boy Herbert's death, that Martineau wrote :—

> The minds of men, equally faithful and reflective, are, I am persuaded, so differently proportioned, that on matters of religious faith it is unsafe to draw conclusions from personal experience. Your vivid and impressive picture of doubt, suggested by internal affliction and relieved by external evidence, is to me a history, to which I find nothing corresponding in my own memory and heart. Not that I can pretend to have escaped the bitter strife and depression of doubt; but it has come amid the daylight, never in the gloom; through the laugh and turmoil of a cheerful world, not in tears and meditative solitude; in the battle of a fresh understanding with the difficulties of testimony and the snares of an intricate logic, never in surrender of heart to the Will of God and of Conscience to the severe call of Duty. I own I cannot explain how metaphysics are at fault here; but somehow sorrow brings its own evidences with it, and wants no witness to the truths it aspires to realise. I am firmly convinced that the Reverential Estimate we make of human nature lies at the root of all religious faith; and that it is by exalting this, through an exhibition of it in absolute perfection, that Christianity itself has its main operation; and that the very same series of external events, gathered around the person of one who was not a Jesus of Nazareth, would have no effect on the religion of the world. Bereavement—when death brings real loss to our deepest affections—forces us to feel how precious and sacred is a human life, how immeasurable the contents of a human soul, and so concurs in the impression which Christianity itself creates.

That letter came out of the heart of the author of the "Endeavours after the Christian Life," the first volume of which was published in 1843, the second in 1847. Dr. Drummond does not note, so far as we have observed, that when a fourth edition of these two volumes was called for in 1866, they were united into one volume, with a new preface, in which Dr. Martineau observes that those sermons appear to be more in harmony with the prevailing tone of religion at that time than at the time of their first appearance. An interesting point which Dr. Drummond does note with regard to the first volume of the "Endeavours" is that the sermon on "The Communion of Saints" was preached in Paradise-street Chapel, Nov. 1, 1840, when Martineau's "Hymns for the Christian Church and Home" were used by the congregation for the first time.

We must not linger further over this first notice except to emphasise again one of the chief impressions received from the biography, and that is of Martineau's wonderful diligence and delight in strenuous activity. We quote again from one of the letters to Dr. Dewey, written in 1871, when Mr. Tayler's death had left Martineau Principal of Manchester New College, and he was in sole charge of the pulpit of Little Portland-street Chapel.

> Your life of delightful retirement would fill me with longing, did not your freshness and vigour—at eleven years in advance of me—tell me that I have not yet earned my repose, and give me hope of some good time still, when the stress is over, and the fruits of toil may be quietly gathered. For the present, sixteen college lectures per week, in addition to my Sunday work and a week-day congregational lecture, and numerous public engagements, forbid me to think of rest or leisure; and, while strength and power of endurance remain, I do not complain that my old age is harder plied than any of the former years. It is a relief and surprise to me to find no tendency creep over me to shut up my mind from new lights of thought, or my will from new methods of action. I remember how in my youth Priestley's dictum distressed me, that no man ever changed his ideas after forty, and made me say, "In that case I hope I shall not live to be forty-one." I never was much of a "radical," notwithstanding some superficial heresies; but I had no notion of surrendering to sheer stupidity and drowsiness half-way, and I have found no abatement in the rate of natural change; and certainly the most important modifications of opinion have come to me since the date when I ought to have ceased to think.

It will be noticed that Dr. Martineau speaks of old age at sixty-six, and the years which followed were among the most trying of his life. But in 1877 he began to spend his summers in Scotland, at the Polchar, Aviemore, of which a charming illustration is given from a sketch of Miss Gertrude Martineau's. This summer home undoubtedly added greatly to the happiness and vigour of his life. "The Rothiemurchus air," he said, "blows away at once all care for health, and gives the thing without the thought of it." Thus through many more happy years he was able to finish every task, and quietly enjoy the long evening of his beautiful old age.

In 1885, the year of his retirement from college, when he was eighty, he wrote to a friend:—

> In the absence of conscious change, I can hardly believe myself to have reached an age which I have always looked upon as something to be feared. Yet here it is; and neither the zest of life, nor the interest in its pursuits and concerns, has perceptibly abated; nor do I crave as yet the discharge from claims upon my diligence, which is regarded as the privilege of old age. Doubtless this is largely due to habitual life among young people, with whom it has been my happiness to be always in contact, and who have saved me from most of the temptations to stupidity and gloom.
> I am thankful to the Divine Disposer for my eighty years—not less for their sorrows than for their joys. The scanty band that yet remains of my early friends is thinning fast, and giving ever a milder look to the face of approaching death—as if preparing to break into a smile at last. My heart has its treasures above and its treasures below, and hardly knows to which it would fain be nearer. The choice will be made by the Best Will, rightly and soon.

It was nearly fifteen years after those exquisite words were written that the peaceful summons did at last come to him, of which Dr. Drummond tells in few and simple words. His last sentence tells of the funeral at Highgate Cemetery, on Tuesday, Jan. 16, 1900: "The morning was wet and gloomy; but just as the grave was reached, a beam of sunlight broke from the weeping clouds and rested on the coffin, a symbol of the glory to which he had passed, and the nearer vision of God."

These volumes are enriched by several portraits and two other illustrations. Miss Gertrude Martineau's sketch of the Polchar has already been referred to, and there is a print from a photograph of Hope-street Church, Liverpool. The portrait of Dr. Martineau's mother, from a sketch made in 1845-6, by Miss H. Bonham-Carter, is interesting, though one could have wished for a more complete representation. Of Dr. Martineau himself, Watts's fine but melancholy portrait, belonging to the sad years 1876-7, naturally holds the first place. The well-known early portrait of 1847-8 is also given, and another, from one of Elliott and Fry's photographs, dated 1873, while the frontispiece of the second volume is from a beautiful chalk drawing made by Mrs. Basil Martineau in 1899, and subsequently exhibited in the Academy. We wish Mr. Emslie's portrait could also have been included. It was earlier than Mrs. Basil's drawing, and yet caught the beautiful light of Dr. Martineau's old age.

TOWARDS A SOCIAL SCIENCE.*

THE task which Mrs. Bosanquet has undertaken in the present volume is "to suggest how we may work out some theory of human nature and social life which will be a guide to us when applied to the actual problems we have to face." However far we may be from possessing any treatment of social problems that can rank as a science, the duty of bringing to bear upon them a carefully disciplined judgment and understanding cannot be too strongly emphasised. The notion that progress must be achieved by action and reaction, by overstatement in one direction counteracted by overstatement in another, or by arbitrary experiment and opportunist measures, is one to which we are sadly too prone to yield. The complexity of the problem is enormous, action is in many directions forced upon us; but neither the one fact nor the other need deter us from the exercise of patient inquiry and clear and vigorous thinking.

It is as an example of this attitude that the present volume, even if it contributed nothing to the solution of the difficulties with which it deals, would be invaluable. It is impossible to speak of it without a tribute, not only to the high qualities of painstaking research, sound judgment, and lucid statement—which, indeed, are no more than we expected from the author of "Rich and Poor" and "The Standard of Life"—but to that equilibrium of mind and heart, at once so desirable and so rare, which both enlists our sympathies in the cause of social reform and endeavours to train them. We feel that this combination of qualities ought to secure the work a foremost place among the few really considerable efforts towards a social science.

Another recommendation is, to our thinking, the absence of anything new in the whole book. We do not want originality in the study of social problems. It gets in the way. It lures writers to theorise brilliantly, and indisposes readers to study soberly. It interrupts the inductive process by which, if at all, principles can be arrived at. Whatever those principles be, they are to be found in the facts. Utopias may be fascinating, but they fail us because they bring theories to human nature instead of from it. Slum dwellings will never be superseded by air castles. The question to ask is what is there in those slum dwellings that can be utilised, and how can it be utilised? In other words, a social science presupposes a theory of human nature and a theory of social life.

With the former of these Mrs. Bosanquet is concerned in a valuable introduction of some sixty pages. Put briefly, her fundamental position is that man tends to progress further than the animals by reason of his capacity for selective action. Other species are the automata of instinct; man alone is truly selective. There follows from this the importance of interests on the selective process and the formation of habit, and the consequent value of independence of character. This latter the author places on high ground:—

The root of the matter lies in the fact that without independence there can be no real ability to serve others. The man who runs about the world trying to shift his burdens on to someone else's back, however willing he may think himself to take theirs in return, will never find himself trusted or relied upon. . . . It is only the practice of bearing our own burdens that can maintain the moral strength to enable us to bear those of others; and as our moral strength dwindles away we soon lose even the desire to be useful.

This, we think, finally disposes of that specious objection to setting forth independence as a social aim that finds expression in a certain class of writers, e.g., Mr. Hobson in "The Social Problem," that since no man is really independent of his fellows, we ought to cease to aim at an illusory independence for others that we do not and cannot practice for ourselves. In her exhaustive preliminary observations we claim that Mrs. Bosanquet has scientifically established the necessity of individual independence to mutual dependence. We wish, however, that Mrs. Bosanquet could have taken a slightly different ground as her basis. In a day when biology and psychology are slowly but surely bringing man into line with other species we should incline to say that his distinctive quality is not selective intelligence, but the capacity for directing his actions from the motive of service—in a word, altruism. We incline to this not only because we believe it profoundly true, but because it at once introduces an ideal element into social economics. Obviously, any attempt to frame a constructive scheme of society must be an art as well as a science. Sociology, if it treat of man merely as a highly intelligent animal, must remain a science only; that is to say it may account for what is, but cannot prescribe what should be. We cannot help thinking that Mrs. Bosanquet's position would have been strengthened all round, and her social theory have arisen more naturally out of her theory of human nature, had she based the latter in man's distinctive altruism instead of on the ground of intelligence and reason.

For when we turn to this theory of social life we find it based on a recognition of the altruistic hypothesis. The pivotal point of the book is the value of the Family as the natural basis of social improvement. The problem of the future is how to develop the Family, and the aim of all beneficent measures, including the Poor Law, ought to be to supplement the Family without diminishing the independence of the individual. The great advantage of such a theory is obvious from the fact that it has the sanction of nature. "The first essential of a science," Jevons tells us, "is that its data should be founded in the constitution of things." In all other applied sciences such a method is implicity followed. Our success in the development of any species rests on our being able, not to supersede nature, but to aid her. With her usual perspicuity and fairness Mrs. Bosanquet examines proposed substitutes for the institution of the Family, but the author of "Fécundité" himself could not have been more emphatic on the conclusion that "the State can never become, nor can it provide, a substitute for family life." This holds both with regard to the peculiar nature of those mutual benefits which parents and children derive from each other, and with regard to the children in particular, and the aged in particular. One of its strongest supports is seen to be in the fact of the enormous length of time—proportionately to other species—which man takes to come to maturity and on which the author rests much of her "theory of human nature." As to the children:

Children can develop their highest qualities only in the sunshine of personal tenderness and affection, and this sunshine can be maintained only in the family. It is to the family, therefore, with all its possibilities of failure, that we must continue to entrust the care of the rising generation.

To the argument that overcrowding in poor districts demands a disintegration of family life, the author pertinently replies that as it is not the family that causes overcrowding, it is hard to see how the disintegration of the family can remedy it. Indeed, "to strengthen the family in the most important respects would go far to lessen the evil of overcrowding." Some temporary disintegration may be necessary when overcrowding inevitably menaces the moral welfare of the child, but the present-day tendency to "sort out the population according to sex and age, and regroup together the units of like character" cannot be too strongly deprecated. Here, as in certain other directions, we should like to see Mrs. Bosanquet's principles applied to other sections of society. What about the disintegration of family life, the separation of the sexes in their most susceptible years, both from each other and from their parents, that is becoming more and more the vogue among the upper classes? How much there is in our modern "upper" life that is a virtual denial of the family! Many issues are raised here.

A considerable portion of the book is concerned with Old Age Pensions. Here again the claims of the Family are urged.

Money-value represents so little of what old people want; it can bring them absolutely nothing of the companionship and care and interest that should be theirs: even if the State were to grant them a competence [which none of the proposed schemes would yield, and which could not be forthcoming without a vast increase in taxation] there would be far more loss than gain.

Still, some aid additional to that of the family is and will be for a long time necessary in many cases, and for this supplementary work Mrs. Bosanquet suggests a system on the lines of the Charity Organisation Society; indeed, substitute for the word "Charity" "Family," and that organisation represents the remedy our author advocates—so far as such an impartial survey can be said to advocate any definite scheme.

In the two chapters which the general reader will find the most interesting—the fourth and fifth—Mrs. Bosanquet verifies theory by history. The old Poor Law failed because it "tempted the people away from their natural duties and responsibilities and then treated them harshly and cruelly in order to restrain their demands." To the novice in the history of "Social Progress" some of the facts the author cites in Chapter V. will prove astounding, and ought to show how widely administration can err when based on any principles but those aiming at the welfare of the people as a whole. The inherent weakness of the old Poor Law lay in its being devised in the interests of a class terrified by the ravages of the French Revolution—in other words, in an insufficient recognition of the homogeneity of the State. Chalmers saw this weakness, and in 1819 started an experiment on a large scale in Glasgow based on the recognition of individual independence and the mutual aid of the family. He proceeded on the principle that unnatural remedies must not be sought till natural remedies have been exhausted. The natural remedies were four: to stimulate the industry of the applicant, to improve his economy, to urge his relatives to his support, and, in the absence or incapacity of relatives, to appeal to the wider family of parish neighbours, or the religious community. In this Chalmers largely anticipated the methods of the C.O.S., and the success which attended his experiment greatly impressed the Commissioners of 1834. Upon it—though with important reservations—they largely remodelled the Poor Law. The result was an immediate stimulus to the wage-earning power of the people, amounting in fifty-six years to a rise in wages of from 50 to 100 per cent. It was fruitful also in the growth of friendly societies, the discovery of co-operation, the formation of Trade Unions—in short, in a strengthening of all those mutual aids that draw society together and give it unity and individuality. For all that, it has not achieved what might have been expected. Pauperism is still a problem—as some think, who have to deal with it directly, a greater problem than ever. This failure of the Law Mrs. Bosanquet accounts for very largely by a mistaken leniency in its application. We believe this to be a just charge and especially applicable to our present-day administration. We shall do well to take the lesson to heart. The first Poor Law failed because of its Opportunism, the second because of expediency. Both these causes are unscientific; the latter particularly so. There may be some excuse for opportunism in a day of darkness and emergency: but there can be no excuse for leniency once principles have been ascertained, and organisation established. There must be no wavering. "It is the great lesson of the nineteenth century," says the author at the close of her review of social progress, "that the English people is strong, but only when it is not tempted to weakness; that it easily succumbs to the suggestion of independence, but responds nobly when called upon to assist its manhood." Again:

If the family is really the proper institution . . . then our main efforts should be directed towards strengthening the family. But at present the tendency is to whittle away its functions in every direction. This year we say that boots should be provided through the school, next year, holidays; to-day we say that dinners should be given at soup kitchens, to-morrow, breakfasts. We tell a man in practice that he has no responsibility towards his children, by putting them wholesale into homes and schools; and we tell him in theory (especially near election time) that he has no responsibility for either himself or his wife or his parents in old age. It is little wonder that the less clear-headed among our people have got confused, that the clear voice of Nature has been drowned for them by the babel of philanthropic and political casuistry, and that they have turned away from the straight and narrow path to the broad path of indifference.

Such preaching strikes wholesomely at our mental untidiness and political haphazard as a people. What we want, above all things at the present time, is sober thought and principled action. Could we only set before us, as an ideal, Mutual Service, and set to work in earnest to better our condition as a people by making all forms of social endeavour from education onwards minister to the efficiency of the family, and discourage every tendency to unnatural dependence, we should possess at once an ideal and an ideal founded on nature.

It is impossible within the limits of this notice to do justice to all the claims of this work on the attention of serious persons who have the good of their nation at heart. We strongly recommend to such a careful perusal of the more strictly economic portions of the book. In conclusion we invite attention to a passage which we think has a special appeal to readers of this paper:

> There is one class of institutions which should be more helpful in this work of public education than they actually are—I mean religious institutions. . . . The Church which is to save the people—if ever again there is to be one—will be not only for the people but of the people. The Church of to-day certainly cannot be accused of any neglect of the people; it seeks out the poor, it multiplies institutions on their behalf, it lavishes its benefits upon them. . . . And for all this the best of the people stand aloof and are entirely uninterested.

What is the reason of this, by no means ignoble, attitude? Mrs. Bosanquet thinks it is because the Churches do not make a sufficient claim upon the people, allowing them to be passive recipients instead of active co-operators. There is much in this, but is it the whole truth? Does not a considerable part of the reason lie in the fact that the Churches are alienated from the modern standpoint, and engaged rather in trying to interest the people in religion per se than in diffusing the spirit of a rational and practical religion unto the common life? Only when religious organisations divest themselves of out-worn beliefs, and alien affections, and move in line with progress, will they tend to the real uplifting of the people; and we believe that then the people will respond readily enough. Unitarians profess to have attained this freedom and enlightenment; does it not therefore rest with them in an exceptional degree, to familiarise themselves with the life of the people, and to demonstrate by practical effort how the indestructible elements of "the religious consciousness" can consecrate and uplift the common life of toil and care?

T. J. HARDY.

SHORT NOTICES.

MR. JOHN HARRISON, to whose services at the organ we have so often been indebted for the enrichment of our public religious services, has added a new gift in the publication of a Te Deum and Jubilate of his own composition. These will be welcomed wherever the revised "Ten Services" are in use, for the music is adapted to the words of the "Te Deum" as there rendered by Dr. Martineau, and the Jubilate has the Doxology in the familiar form, "Now unto the God of grace, for the might of His Spirit and the love of Christ." The setting of the "Te Deum" is especially rich in harmony, and expressive of deep religious feeling. Mr. Harrison's work is happy in its dedication "to the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, M.A., of Manchester College, Oxford, as an expression of sincere admiration for his efforts in connection with the Ministers' Pension and Insurance Fund." (Philip Green, Essex Hall. Sixpence.)

The Sunday School Hymn Book (to be distinguished from Mrs. Farrington's more recent "Hymns for Children," also published by the S.S.A.) has long been in familiar use in our schools, having been originally published some sixty years ago, while at intervals of about twenty years new and revised editions have appeared. In 1881 the Rev. Dendy Agate edited the third edition, and he has now brought out a fourth, greatly improved in form. As to the hymns there are twenty-one added as a supplement, seven are printed in a completer form than in the earlier book, and there are twelve, more suitable for children, substituted for others, but so as to preserve the numbering and general arrangement of the third edition. Thus it will be seen that this little book moves with the times, and its days of usefulness are by no means at an end. (Sunday School Association, Essex Hall. 6d. net.)

MR. JONATHAN NIELD'S Guide to the Best Historical Novels and Tales was published last May, and was fully noticed in the INQUIRER of July 19. In that notice, warmly appreciating the interest and value of the book, the desire was expressed for an index; and now that a second edition has been so soon called for Mr. Nield has added complete indexes, both of authors and of the novels so carefully tabulated in his Guide. With this very welcome addition the book is to be even more warmly commended to all lovers of historical fiction. (Elkin Mathews. 5s. net.)

A SECOND series of Sir Leslie Stephen's Studies of a Biographer, to be added as Volumes III. and IV. to the previous issue, gather up from the reviews in a most welcome form fifteen essays by a writer to whom it is always a pleasure and no little profit to listen. Here we have a reprint of Sir Leslie's "New Lights on Milton," from the Quarterly, and his articles, chiefly from the National, on such various writers as Donne, Ruskin, Bagehot, Huxley, Froude, Emerson, Trollope, and Stevenson. "Shakespeare as a Man" and "The Browning Letters" are also included, and that delightful article, "In Praise of Walking," which appeared in the Monthly Review last year. (Duckworth and Co. Two vols. 12s.)

AMONG the books we have received for review are the late Professor Sidgwick's lectures on "The Ethics of T. H. Green, Herbert Spencer, and James Martineau" (Macmillan, 8s. 6d.); Mr. Carpenter's "Composition of the Hexateuch" (Longmans, 18s.); "Pascal" and "Euclid," in the World's Epoch-Makers Series (T. and T. Clark, 3s. each); "Supernatural Religion," new and cheaper edition, one volume (Watts and Co., 6s.); "Flower o' the Corn," by S. R. Crockett (Clarke and Co., 6s.); "Preaching to the Times," by Canon H. H. Henson (Clarke and Co., 3s. 6d.); "The Mind of Man," a Text-book of Psychology, by G. Spiller (Sonnenschein, 7s. 6d.); "Clue to the Economic Labyrinth," by M. Flürscheim (Sonnenschein, 7s. 6d.); and Dr. Warschauer's "The Coming of Christ" (Philip Green, 1s. 6d. net).

SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

AUTUMNAL CONFERENCE.

AT the Conference of this Association, held in the Church of the Divine Unity, at Newcastle-on-Tyne, on Tuesday afternoon, Oct. 7, five papers, as we have already recorded, dealing with various aspects of Sunday-school work, were read. We had hoped to afford more space to these, but must be content with the following summaries.

The Sunday School as a Social Force.

The first paper was by Mr. J. S. MACKIE, of Burnley, on "The Sunday-school as a Social Force." It opened with a vigorous statement of the urgency of social questions and various suggestions made for the bettering of the condition of the people; but equally important was the manner in which this should be effected, whether by evolution or revolution, whether by passion and violence or by mutual regard and love. Recognising the better way, he had been deeply impressed by the latent power of the Sunday-school as a social force. It had already been of incalculable service in that respect.

"Its social and educational work has, up to this point, been quite as important as its religious work. It has made out of very unpromising material thousands of good citizens; it has stimulated both boys and girls to improve their mental equipment; it has laid the foundations of myriads of happy homes—for whether or not marriages are made in heaven, we know that great numbers of happy marriages have been made in the Sunday-school. It is not so much that in the Sunday-school direct teaching about citizenship, political economy, social science, hygiene, or domestic economy has borne much immediate fruit; but that a general atmosphere is created by the self-denying labours and personal example of the teachers—an atmosphere in which the social virtues grow spontaneously and naturally.

"The study of the Bible, even though it may not be studied quite on the lines that we approve, in many cases; and especially the study of the life and ethical teachings of Jesus go far to produce that atmosphere—an atmosphere pervaded by the greatest and best of levellers—mutual human sympathy. Sympathy is the child of true religion; and our churches and Sunday-schools ought to be the greatest nurseries of sympathy."

Whether or not the churches are true to their ideal, and actually bridge over the gulf between wealth and poverty, Mr. Mackie urged that the Sunday-school has great opportunities for the nurture of such genuine sympathy, through which alone a final solution of the great social problems can be found; and he pleaded that more people of leisure and culture should take part in the work, that every rank of society should meet together in frank fellowship, to share in this beneficent work and gain a true mutual understanding, and thus realise to its fullest extent the social force which the Sunday-school is so admirably fitted to exert.

A Missing Link in our Sunday School Literature.

The Rev. FRANK WALTERS bore warm testimony to the admirable literature, so varied and so helpful, published by the Sunday School Association, a literature appreciated by many besides the teachers and scholars in the schools. Yet he had found there was one thing lacking, to guide the average teacher in the choice and the use of the books, to save the time of which busy and hard-worked teachers often had so little to spare, and to help them to assimilate and apply all the good material furnished by the books. Therefore he suggested the issue of a monthly or quarterly magazine, consisting solely of Lesson Notes—each lesson being dated for the Sunday on which it is to be used. Some passage of the Bible might be taken, its meaning explained, its teaching elucidated, its bearing on conduct and character illustrated. So the teachers would have guidance in the preparation of a good lesson for every Sunday, and he did not think it would promote laziness, but rather secure due preparation. Such notes might be interleaved or printed with wide margin for the teacher's use, and should be as little in evidence as possible during the lesson, its substance having been thoroughly assimilated beforehand. The "Lesson Notes" might be used for a Teachers' preparation class, and would certainly encourage diffident teachers, and would be an undoubted addition to the strength of their work.

Temperance Teaching in the Sunday School.

Miss CLARA C. LUCAS, of Darlington, noted with thankfulness the progress made by the Temperance movement during the past fifty years, and while efforts of legislation were now strenuously promoted, laid stress on Band of Hope work, for prevention, and the need to keep a hold on the young people as they grew up. To this end Temperance teaching should be encouraged in the Sunday-school as in the day-school. This would be a natural supplement to the more general teaching of self-control and the training of character in the schools. The Temperance Question, Cobden had said, was at the root of all social reform; they were pledged to the training of good citizens, and they ought to make their Temperance work, in every aspect of it, help towards that end.

Our Traditions in Relation to our Scholars.

The Rev. OTTWELL BINNS, of Scarborough, speaking modestly as a newcomer, made an earnest plea for the kindling of loyalty and courage and a worthy pride in the past history of our churches by impressing upon the children their noble traditions, and making clear to them at what great price of sacrifice and tears the liberty they enjoy has been won. Children responded readily to such appeals. Every English child was proud of the name of England, and in their schools the children would readily understand how honourable was the history of Nonconformity, from the Ejectment of 1662, and in our special circle, the sacrifices, the courage and endurance of such men as Biddle and Priestley and Lindsey. The story should be told, and the teacher's true emotion would be kindled in the children's hearts, and they would be strengthened for a like courage and loyalty in their own day.

The Duty of the Church in regard to the Sunday School.

The last paper was by Mr. CHARLES SLATER, Superintendent of the Newcastle School. The Church he regarded, in its broadest and widest sense, as a union of kindred minds, bound together by a common desire for the realisation of a true religious life; and the distinctive principles and teaching of their own churches ought to be impressed upon the children. This would be their best contribution towards the uplifting of humanity and the leavening of the religious life of the country. Properly presented, their teaching would meet a popular need and would hold the loyalty of their young people. He appealed for more earnest service in the Sunday-school.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

WILL you come with me again to Norway, children? I should like to tell you some more about it. I think it will be more interesting if you look at the map again.

After we had crossed the Arctic circle, and sailed up the great wide waters of the Vest Fjord, and passed between the splendid Lofoten Islands and the mainland, we came at last one afternoon to a little place called Tromsö. It stood on the slope of a low hill, above the broad Fjord; and to the south-west of it, across the water, were great snowy mountains, with the snow almost to the water's edge. We went ashore, and walked about the little town, and looked at the shops and the people; and then we sat down to sketch. We were looking down one of the three or four streets which the town contained; the houses were just like the little houses that, when I was a little girl, we used to have as toys, and take out of a wooden box and set on the table. They were wooden houses, pink, yellow, grey, blue or white, with red roofs; and here and there a church stood up above them; and then the Fjord lay beyond, with its great white mountains for the background of it all, and the sun streamed in bright patches across the little street, and lit up the snowy mountains to a dazzling white, with blue shadows.

But we had no sooner sat down than from all parts came flocking children to see what we were doing; little Norwegian girls and boys, with broad fair faces. They were very shy and quiet at first; but as more and more came they began to whisper, and then to talk, and then to chatter, and then to push each other about, and all to peep and pry and struggle to see us paint! They came nearer and nearer till we were nearly distracted, and I tried to make them understand that they were to go away; but when I said "Now run away," they only imitated, and said "Run away, run away," and then laughed; but they did not go.

At last a young lady came and looked over us, and began to talk English to us. We asked her how she had learned, and she said she was a teacher in the school, and taught English, French and German, and was glad to have a chance of speaking any of them. So we asked her to get the children to go away, and she spoke to them, and they melted away till there was not one left. As long as she stayed and talked to us they did not come back, but the moment she went away they all came buzzing back like a swarm of flies! When at last we got up to go back to our steamer we said "good-bye" to them, and they said "Run away"!

After Tromsö we went on to Hammerfest. It is the most northern town in the world, a little sad-looking grey town with a hill behind it, and without a tree anywhere to be seen. There is a harbour with many boats and ships, and a brisk trade with Russia and the Spitzbergen whalers; and all along the shore the codfish are hanging up to dry in the sun, or in the sheds are packed flat in packages to be sent away in ships.

At last one evening we reached the North Cape; and, each with a new broomstick as an "Alpenstock," we went ashore in the steamer's boats, in a little bay round on the eastern side of the Cape. And then we began to climb up. It was as steep as any climb I ever had; and before we got a third of the way up we came to thick snow lying over the whole distance to the top. Our feet slipped back, and we were often thrown on to hands and knees, and often we plunged up to our knees in snow. A rope had been fixed on stanchions as a hand-rail, and we pulled ourselves up by this and used our broomsticks; but it was very hard work, and the sailors helped some of us very much. The first of the party who climbed were seen like little black flies on the snow, creeping up above us.

After a long struggle we arrived breathless out above the snow and on the long level back of the North Cape, and walked along to the end, till we could look straight out over the sea, with nothing between us and the Polar regions. It was nearly 11 o'clock at night when we got up to that point, but broad daylight. It was a cloudy night, so that we did not see the sun himself at midnight, but we saw where he was, and he spread a beautiful mysterious golden light upon the sea, and it looked very solemn. We saw our steamer down below, looking like a little toy ship. There is a hut at the top, where people can get champagne; and letters are stamped there with the stamp of the North Cape, and then taken down and sent off by the steamer.

Just at 12 o'clock we saw our steamer pass out of the bay, and stop just opposite the point of the Cape; and then she fired a gun, and the sailors who had come up with us had taken some balls of dynamite in their packets, which they lighted and threw over the face of the cliff, and they exploded in the air, in answer to the ship's gun.

Going down through the snow was really quite as difficult as going up; and as it was so steep it felt really dangerous, for fear of slipping; but a tall strong Norwegian sailor went before me, and I put my feet in his steps and held by his shoulder, and we reached the bottom of the little valley safely, and returned to our ship. It was a wonderful night to have passed, and a wonderful place to have been to, and I shall never forget it, nor lose the impression of that night on the northernmost point of Europe.

ALL SAINTS AND ALL SOULS.

TO-DAY in the English and Roman Catholic Churches is All Saints' Day, All Hallows' Day, and to-morrow, in the Roman Catholic Church at any rate, is kept as the festival of All Souls. After the lapse of a few centuries in the Christian Era it was felt that there had been far more saints than one for every day in the year—indeed, far more than had ever been discovered or canonised—and a few centuries later it was discovered that however past hoping for many sinful souls might be on earth, they were not past praying for, and a kindly legend tells how hell itself was being rapidly emptied by a prayerful Church, and especially by the assiduous orisons of the abbots and monks of Clugny. We notice that one or two of the latest built of the churches of our own community are dedicated to All Souls, an appropriate acknowledgment and proclamation of the fundamental principle of our Church, the recognition of the universal brotherhood of men. Nothing seems more appropriate than that our Church should be the Clugny of Churches, prayerfully and gratefully eager to remember the great brotherhood of the past, of the strong and the weak, of the prominent and the obscure, and to recall the indispensableness of some deemed weak and obscure to the greatness of the great. It should be our most agreeable task to release them from the insatiable and cruel grasp of forgetfulness, indifference, and ingratitude, and to raise them into the benigner air of remembrance and thoughtfulness and gratitude.

Nothing, or almost nothing, is known of MASACCIO. He is one of that large army of men, not great enough to have left a name for greatness, yet without whom men of famous greatness would perhaps not have risen to greatness, or not to such greatness as they attained. He had secrets of great art, yet he was without the skill fully to reveal them. Other men perceived his secrets, and embodying them in works of great skill, rose to the heights which he could not attain to. He belongs to a class which we might call the unknown yet indispensable men. They are a large and varied class, who seem to pass swiftly and naturally into oblivion, and to whom men forget to be grateful. They seem to find their natural place in what GEORGE ELIOT has so greatly written of as—

> The choir invisible
> Of those immortal dead who live again
> In minds made better by their presence ; live
> In pulses stirred to generosity,
> In deeds of daring rectitude, in scorn
> For miserable aims that end in self,
> In thoughts sublime that pierce the night like stars,
> And with their mild persistence urge men's search
> To vaster issues.

What little is known of MASACCIO has been expressed powerfully and sympathetically by LOWELL in his poem bearing that name. The paintings referred to by LOWELL, he saw in the Brancacci Chapel in Florence. The painter is of unknown origin, birthplace, and date : all is unknown but his name and frescoes in this chapel.

> He came to Florence long ago
> And painted here these walls, that shone
> For Raphael and for Angelo,
> With secrets deeper than his own,
> Then shrank into the dark again,
> And died, we know not how or when.
> "And is this," mused I, "all ye earned,
> High-vaulted brain and cunning hand,
> That ye to greater men could teach
> The skill yourselves could never reach ?"
> "And who were they," I mused, "that wrought
> Through pathless wilds, with labour long,
> The highways of our daily thought ?" . . .
> What strong-souled martyrs died in flame
> To make it possible that thou
> Shouldst here with brother sinners bow.
> Thoughts that great hearts once broke for, we > Breathe cheaply in the common air ;
> The dust we trample heedlessly
> Throbbed once in saints and heroes rare,
> Who perished, opening to their race
> New pathways to the commonplace.
> O nameless dead !

The "nameless dead," the openers for their race of new pathways to the commonplace ! It is worth while giving them a thought. Sometimes a man looks at some Brancacci Chapel in his soul and reads in the curiously inspiring though dim frescoes painted there the secrets of his own power and greatness, and he leaves the name at least on record of the otherwise unknown "MASACCIO." ARETHUSA is hardly more than a name, yet ST. CHRYSOSTOM is great because of the frescoes she, his mother, painted in that Brancacci Chapel in his soul. MONICA is little more than a name, but her impressions left on those same chapel walls made ST. AUGUSTINE great. Think of the unknown tutors and schoolmasters of the greatest men, the Masaccios who flung the secrets of greatness and power upon the bare walls of those human Brancacci temples. And some of those greatest men, as they scan those old storied frescoes of the long past of their schooldays, confess humbly how much, how nearly all they are they owe to their Masaccios. Let us look in upon these walls within our souls, once bare. Have no Masaccios scattered rich though imperfect frescoes along them ? Secrets of great qualities of mind and heart and will we shall surely find on those walls, which it may be our task and glory to reveal and make manifest in firmer lines and more enduring colours. Or ours may be the lowlier lot to do in our imperfect way our imperfect best, and cover some bare walls with secret hints of priceless beauty and inspiration. We too may at least be fellow-citizens with the saints—of the Household of GOD, the House of All Souls, our dwelling-place in all generations. All saints have been chiefly conspicuous for their deep interest in all souls. The greatest saints gravitate towards the greatest sinners, and the greatest sinners towards the greatest saints. The most trying circumstances furnish the conditions for the greatest saints and the greatest sinners. Surely the key to the problem of sin and sorrow will be found in the hands of the saints. They strive to find the lost sheep. The setting sun alone puts an end to their search. The Prince of Saints seeks until he finds. One in aim and one in means—to bring all "to GOD who is our Home," by love which is the soul of every home. "Behold all souls are mine." We shall not always be strangers and sojourners, but fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the "Household of GOD." Homines transeunt, sed veritas Domini manet in aeternum. Sine personarum acceptione variis modis loquitur nobis Deus. So spake a truly Catholic saint, THOMAS A KEMPIS. Ut migraturus habita is the quaint motto on a house made with hands. So let it be.

LIVING WATERS.

Spring up, O well ; sing ye unto it.—Numbers xxi. 17.

THESE words are among the most ancient in the Bible. Long before the oral traditions respecting the origin and early history of the people of Israel had been gathered together and set down in writing, this song had probably been sung many a time when people came to the well to draw water. For it has been said of this song that "it is a solitary survival, perhaps, of popular snatches sung in honour of wells that had a history." Such wells became sacred when men remembered the great men of old who had dug them and thought of them with reverence and love.

The book of Genesis tells of many ancient wells round which had gathered a sacred tradition. There was Beersheba, on the extreme southern frontier of Israel, "the well of the oath" which one legend associates with Isaac, another with Abraham, commemorating in either case a solemn covenant of peace made by a great forefather of the people with his turbulent neighbours, and illustrating the truth that "when a man's ways please the Lord, he maketh even his enemies to be at peace with him." Again, there was the well which bore the wondrous name of "the well of the living one who seeth me." And if men sang to that fountain and said "Spring up, O well!" then there came into their minds the story of poor Hagar, how when she fled from her mistress and nothing seemed in store for her and her unborn child but famine and death, God's angel met her by "the fountain of water in the wilderness," and she learned (as many another has learned in trouble and loneliness) that there was still a Living One whose eye could see and whose heart could pity.

Not far from that "fountain of water in the wilderness" there were three other wells which preserved a beautiful legend of the mild and peaceful patriarch Isaac. For the first was called "Contention" because when Isaac's herdmen had digged it the herdmen of the place strove with them, saying, "The water is ours." And the second well was called "Enmity" because they strove for that also. And the third well bore the beautiful name of Rehoboth, or "the Well of the Broad Places," for Isaac said, "Now the Lord hath made room for us." That was a well worth singing to indeed! It is often a good thing to leave petty wranglers alone, to remember that God's world is wide, and to go forth and dig wells for ourselves, until we find that God has led us forth into a broad place where the water of life springs securely for us, where the voices of them that strive and cry sound far away, and none can make us afraid.

Another well, not mentioned in Genesis, was associated with the patriarch Jacob. It was a tradition of the Samaritans that it was "our father Jacob" who had given them their deep well near Shechem and had drunk thereof himself and his sons and his cattle. That well was destined to a new and greater sanctity through him who sat by it wearied with his journey and said, "Everyone that drinketh of this water shall thirst again; but whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him shall never thirst; but the water that I shall give him shall become in him a well of water springing up unto eternal life."

Thus, from its preciousness, pure running water came to be the symbol of things yet more precious, of refreshment not for the weary body, but for that deep thirst which belongs to the mind and soul of man. "The teaching of the wise is a fountain of life." All discovery of truth may be compared to the digging of a well. It is hard work, and it is not given to everyone to do. Those who do it best are the true princes and nobles of the human race. But when once the work is done, then the water springs up of itself and is free to all. With regard to all our knowledge that saying is true, "Others have laboured, and ye are entered into their labour." We look back to all that God has given us through the labours of the wise who have gone before us, to—

> The wells which the princes digged,
> Which the nobles of the people delved.

And as we look back we ought to feel a noble joy, a joy that takes us out of ourselves, away from our own small affairs and poor attainments, lost for the moment in admiration and gratitude. "Spring up, O well of truth and knowledge!" we cry, "Spring up O well! which by the inspiration of our Father's spirit the great and wise have digged that we might drink and live. Spring up, O well! Sing ye unto it."

I have said that every new discovery of truth is like a well dug by patient toil until the water gushes forth. And when we look back with reverence and joy to those whose labours have thus given us knowledge, then we are set free from the dangers to which knowledge is exposed. For knowledge, good and lovely as it is, has dangers of its own. Divorced from humility and proud of itself, it is an ugly thing. St. Paul had come across knowledge of this sort. "Knowledge," he says, "puffeth up." But the knowledge which puffs up is usually a very superficial knowledge, lacking in thoughtfulness and reverence. But when we remember that we have nothing which we have not received—received not only from God, but from men who have gone before us—when we remember that in everything we know we are drinking of wells which the princes digged, which the nobles of the people delved painfully with their staves, then our knowledge does not puff us up. Rather we grow humble as we think with reverence of those who have gone before, our fathers who gave us these wells of truth and drank thereof themselves. All knowledge becomes sacred to us, and we find that we cannot learn anything accurately, or think anything truly (however little it may be), without belonging to the goodly fellowship—past, present, and to come—of those who think and learn well, who help to dig ever-fresh wells of living water for their fellow-men. Even now, doubtless, there are great brethren of ours (many, it may be, quite unknown to fame) who are digging such wells—or perhaps clearing old ones which the Philistines have stopped—out of which future generations shall drink and to which they shall sing.

Such thoughts as these are not perhaps inappropriate at a time when the attention of the people of this country is turned to the education of the children. It is a pity that so much of the discussion should turn, as usual, upon what is called "the religious difficulty." Let us hope that our wise men may succeed in cutting a fair highway through that thorny and ugly maze. But one truth, it seems to me, should be impressed on parents and teachers and scholars alike, and it is this: Whatever may be the so-called religious instruction, whether it be little or much, which is given in a school, the sacredness of teaching does not end there, but covers the whole range of the school course. If the story of the Jews and of the early Church is sacred history, no less sacred is the history of England; the faculties which enable the trained eye and hand and ear to enter into the world of art and music are as truly as any wonders of Pentecost the gifts of the Holy Spirit; the laws of arithmetic and geometry and all the truths of Natural Science are water from the fount of eternal truth to which "princes of the people," guided by the eternal Spirit, have dug the way. Those schools only are truly religious which recognise in all the teaching so profanely called secular a sacredness as great as in any theological doctrine. When this is truly believed and felt, then, and not till then, is there hope that our children may be inspired with a reverent and ardent love of learning without which all teaching is but dry bones. Then there will be joy and enthusiasm in the midst of toil both for teachers and scholars, and the ancient words will be the language of their hearts —"Spring up, O well; sing ye unto it."

J. REMINGTON WILSON.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

COUNCIL MEETING.

A MEETING of the Council was held on Tuesday afternoon, Oct. 28, at Essex Hall. The chair was taken by Mr. DAVID MARTINEAU, J.P., who regretted that illness prevented the President, the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, from taking the chair. The other members present were Rev. Frederic Allen, Mrs. L. M. Aspland, Mr. G. Callow, Rev. George Carter, Mr. Edgar Chatfeild Clarke, Rev. V. D. Davis, B.A.; Rev. James Harwood, B.A.; Mr. H. B. Lawford, Miss Lucas, Mrs. W. G. Mace, Miss Mary Martineau, Mrs. E. L. Merton, Mr. C. F. Pearson, Rev. H. Woods Perris, Mr. F. Pinnock, Rev. W. Chynoweth Pope, Mr. J. T. Preston, Miss Marian Pritchard, Mr. Richard Robinson, Miss E. Sharpe, Mr. W. Spiller, Rev. F. W. Stanley, Mr. Hugh Stannus, Rev. J. E. Stronge, Mr. J. Sudbery, Rev. W. G. Tarrant, B.A.; Mr. S. S. Tayler, Miss Tayler, Miss Teschemacher, Mr. E. C. Thurgood, Mr. Arthur Titford, Mr. J. Harrop White, Sir Roland K. Wilson, Bart.; Rev. W. Wooding, B.A.; Mr. T. Pallister Young, and the Secretary (Rev. W. Copeland Bowie).

The minutes of the last meeting of the Council, on April 15, having been read and confirmed, the Secretary read the report of the Executive Committee as follows:—

REPORT.

Since the last meeting of the Council, the Executive Committee have met four times, and eleven meetings of various sub-committees have been held. Each sub-committee elects its own chairman, and the appointments for the year ending June, 1903, are as follows:—Finance, Mr. C. F. Pearson; Scottish, Mr. Oswald Nettlefold; Mission, Rev. F. W. Stanley; Publications, Rev. James Harwood, B.A.; Indian, Mr. Ion Pritchard; Civil Rights, Mr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C.; General Purposes and Anniversary, Rev. W. G. Tarrant. The Executive Committee meet on the second Wednesday of the month, the sub-committees during the previous week. It is important that the secretaries of congregations and other correspondents should forward their communications to the Secretary at Essex Hall in time for them to be placed before the sub-committee; this will avoid delay in dealing with the applications.

Finance.—For the nine months of the current year, ending Sept. 30, the receipts have been as follows:—Subscriptions, £1,313; donations, £133; collections, £100; dividends and interest, £759; book department, £925; special income, £50; making, with a balance of £82 from 1901, in all £3,360. The expenditure for the same period was as follows:—Grants to churches, £1,591; grants of books and pamphlets, £259; foreign work, £201; book department, £622; office and book-room salaries, £538; maintenance expenses, £207; making in all, £3,418. The expenditure has thus exceeded the income by £58.

The investment account has received the following additions :—Legacies, £200 ; sale of Thorne Chapel, £250 ; repayment of loan for the purchase of land at Forest-gate, £100. The executors of the late F. M. Sir Neville Chamberlain have paid the sum of £1,000, the income from which will be applied for the benefit of the Unitarian minister for the time being at Southampton, or, if there should be no minister there, for the benefit of some other Unitarian minister in the South of England.

Publications.—It is exceedingly gratifying to the Committee to report that the revised edition of the Essex Hall Hymnal has already met with a most favourable response, so much so that the first edition will soon be exhausted, and a second impression is now being printed. The paper, type, and binding have given general satisfaction, and the price for quantities of 100 or more has been fixed so as to cover the cost of production only without profit. The Committee have reason to believe that in issuing the new Hymnal they have performed a helpful service to the churches, and they are naturally glad to find that their labours have been so highly appreciated. In response to requests which have reached the Committee, arrangements will be made to supply the Chant-book, printed on the same size of paper, so that both books can be bound together in the same volume, as in the case of the older Essex Hall Hymnal.

The following books and pamphlets have been published since the last meeting of Council :—"Some Thoughts on Christology," the Essex Hall Lecture, by Dr. Drummond ; the third edition of "God and the Soul," by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong ; a second edition of the Essay on "Miracles in the Old and New Testament," by the Rev. Walter Lloyd ; a new tract, "What Jesus was to God," by the Rev. John Page Hopps ; and reprints of several of the Tracts for the Times, and the Unitarian Leaflets series. The Committee have purchased 250 copies of an admirable book by the Rev. J. T. Bixby, Ph.D., "The New World and the New Thought," which they would commend to the notice of the members of the Association and others interested in liberal religious thought. Copies of a new book by the Rev. M. J. Savage, D.D., "Men and Women," have been ordered from the American Unitarian Association, with whose publication work the Committee are in cordial sympathy, and they hope to be of assistance in discovering a larger market in England for books by American Unitarian writers. It has also been a pleasure to take an active part in promoting the sale of the newly published "Life and Letters of Dr. Martineau," by Dr. Drummond and Mr. Upton.

There are several interesting books and pamphlets now in hand, which will be published by the Committee in due course, among which may be named :—"The Bible in the Nineteenth Century," Eight Lectures by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, M.A. ; "Types of Religious Experience," by the Revs. E. W. Lummis, William Wooding, G. V. Crook, Alex. Webster, and L. de B. Klein, with an Introduction by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong ; also a brief sketch of the Life of Emerson, with selections from his writings, by the Rev. W. C. Gannett. "The Pocket Almanac" and the "Essex Hall Year Book for 1903" are in course of preparation ; the former will be published on Dec. 1, the latter on Jan. 1.

Professor F. Bracciforti, of Milan, has translated into Italian the Addresses and Papers at the Meetings of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers, by the Revs. R. A. Armstrong, J. Estlin Carpenter, Dr. Drummond, and Professor Pfleiderer, towards the cost of which the Committee made a grant of £10. The Council will be pleased to learn that in publishing the volume containing the International Addresses and Papers the Association incurred no financial loss, nor was it necessary to make any call upon Mr. Charles W. Jones, who had generously promised to make good any loss. The circulation of the book had been large enough to pay for the cost of production.

The Committee have made grants of books and pamphlets to ministers, churches, postal missions, libraries, and private individuals from Jan. 1 to Sept. 30, 1902, to the value of £259 ; 1,290 books and 64,294 pamphlets and leaflets have been given away during this period. This number is exclusive of those sent to India and to Scotland, which are paid for by special funds and not by the ordinary funds of the Association. Specimens of several old tracts, for which the demand had practically ceased, were sent out to the ministers or secretaries of a few congregations and missions, and the available supply has now been disposed of, and letters gratefully acknowledging the gifts have been received. The Committee are always ready to make free grants of Unitarian tracts for use in any part of the world where the literature is likely to be of service to the cause of truth, liberty, and religion.

Mission Work.—The Treasurer's statement shows that the Committee have already expended in grants during the current year £500 more than they have received in subscriptions, donations, and collections. Since the last meeting of the Council the following additional grants have been paid or promised :—Blackpool (South Shore) £25, Colwyn Bay Services £10, Darlington £10, Devonport £50, Kentish Town £60, Kilburn £25, Lampeter £100, Loughborough £20, Poole £10, Whitchurch £15. There are still several congregations in want of ministers, where the work is arduous, the salary small, and the prospects none too bright. The need of a few more men possessing strong faith, unflagging industry, and bouyant hope, willing to give themselves to the work of the ministry in a whole-hearted way, is very great. The Committee have before them proposals for again sending able missionary ministers to visit and preach at some of the smaller and more isolated congregations in different parts of the country ; and they will be pleased to consider any applications which reach them for such special services. The arrangement made by the Committee with the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke is for the present ended, the congregation at Little Portland-street Chapel having undertaken the entire responsibility of the services in London from October, 1902, to March, 1903. It is, however, with great satisfaction that they are able to report that the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter has accepted an invitation to deliver his course of six lectures on the "Bible in the Nineteenth Century" at Bristol, Leicester, Manchester, and Swansea. It will be seen that an effort has been made to allow people in widely different parts of the country the privilege of hearing these admirable lectures. Bolton, Leeds, Liverpool, London, Newcastle-on-Tyne, and Aberdeen, Edinburgh, and Glasgow have already profited by Mr. Carpenter's visits. Educational work of this kind might easily be extended if larger funds were placed at the disposal of the Committee.

McQuaker Fund.—The large grant paid towards the cost of erecting a new church at Aberdeen will prevent the Committee from undertaking any further missionary or propagandist work in Scotland this year. The new church, when erected, is sure to prove of great advantage to the congregation. It is gratifying to learn that Mr. Andrew Carnegie has not confined his gifts for organs to "Orthodox" churches in Scotland, but has also promised £200 to Mr. Webster towards the cost of placing an organ in the new Unitarian church at Aberdeen. The debt on the church at Dundee, with the help of the McQuaker Trustees, has now been paid off. The settlement of Mr. A. Irvine Innes as minister at Kilmarnock has resulted in an increased attendance at the services, and a Sunday-school has been started. Mr. G. A. Ferguson, a former student at Manchester College, Oxford, has commenced his ministry at Kilmarnock under happy auspices, and both he and the congregation are looking to the future with hopefulness. Since his removal from Kirkcaldy the Rev. A. E. Parry has acted as secretary of the Postal Mission work in Scotland, but it was thought better to entrust the work to one of the resident ministers in Scotland, and, acting on the recommendation of the Committee of the Scottish Unitarian Association, Mr. Irvine Innes has been invited to undertake this duty for one year, and he has kindly consented to carry on the work so successfully performed by Mr. Parry. On the suggestion of the Scottish Unitarian Association two courses of lectures expository of Unitarian Christianity to be delivered at places in the vicinity of Glasgow were arranged for. Ill-health prevented the Rev. James Forrest from delivering his lectures, but he hopes to do so shortly ; the Rev. E. T. Russell lectured at Bridgeton, Govan, Kirkintillock, Shettleston, and Townhead—ten lectures in all—when the average attendance was twenty. The Committee believe that by the judicious circulation of Unitarian literature much good may be done in extending a knowledge of Unitarianism in Scotland, and latterly more attention has been paid to this department of the work with satisfactory results. Mr. J. Ewart, M.A., the McQuaker student, has entered on his third year at Manchester College, Oxford, where he has done good work.

Foreign Work.—The foreign work of the Association has increased during the last few years, and there is little doubt that a large field of usefulness lies before the Committee. Correspondents in all parts of the world are now in frequent communication with Essex Hall, and there is an increasing demand for information concerning the principles, faith, and ideals of Unitarians. The President recently visited Denmark, where he had the opportunity of conferring with the leaders of the Unitarian movement, both in the neighbourhood of Copenhagen and in Jutland. He found them profoundly in earnest, and deeply religious. Lys over Landet, published weekly, contains translations of English and American Unitarian pamphlets and sermons, as well as original Danish articles. This paper is their one bond of union, their one organ of intercommunication, their one instrument of appeal to a wider circle. Its continuance was deemed essential, and as it seemed the one effectual way at present of promoting Unitarianism in Denmark the Committee have made a grant of £20 towards the cost of printing and circulating copies for the current year. Several Unitarian books have been published in Danish, among them "Denials and Beliefs of Unitarians," by the Rev. John Wright, which the Rev. A. M. Jensen, now of Aarhus, translated.

Of Auckland, New Zealand, the Rev. W. Jellie, and the secretary and treasurer of the congregation write most cheerfully. The Unitarian movement has succeeded beyond expectation. The services are largely attended, the people are earnest and devoted ; and the most unusual request has been made to reduce the annual grant of £75 by one-half next year. Mr. Jellie believes that there is an equally good opening at Wellington for a zealous minister not afraid to labour and to wait. In Australia, deplorable and painful scandals have cast their shadows over the work at Adelaide and at Sydney ; it will be some time before Unitarianism can recover from the blow which it has received at the hands of discredited ministers. At Melbourne, the Rev. R. H. Lambley, a minister held in the highest esteem, is bravely working in the face of many difficulties. Towards a Jubilee Fund of £500 which the congregation is raising in aid of special Unitarian work, the Committee have promised £100, and private donors have sent £87 in addition, and it is hoped that at least £13 more will be forthcoming, so that England's total contribution may be not less than £200.

An urgent plea to follow the example of other denominations and send out from England one of our ablest and most representative preachers to Australia and New Zealand, on a lecturing and preaching tour, is receiving the attention of the Committee at the present time, but nothing has yet been settled. In Canada, large numbers of Unitarian books and pamphlets have been forwarded for distribution. Mr. Z. Toyosaki, of Tokyo, Japan, with the aid of the Committee, is pursuing his second year course of studies at Manchester College, Oxford; and an excellent report of his work at the College has been received.

Mr. Jochumssen, the well-known Icelandic poet and preacher, in a communication addressed to the Committee, urged that Iceland now offered an important field of usefulness for the spread of liberal religious thought. To help forward Unitarian work among Icelanders a grant of £50 was promised to Mr. R. Peterssen, of Meadville, to enable him to study for one year at Oxford. He was expected to take up his residence there this month, but he has not yet arrived.

Work in India.—Mr. V. R. Shinde, B.A., is now in his second and last year at Manchester College, Oxford, where he has pursued his studies with diligence. The Committee of the Brahmo Somajes have been invited to select another student for recommendation to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association and to Manchester College, to succeed Mr. Shinde in October, 1903. Mr. Ion Pritchard, the Chairman of the Indian Sub-Committee, as a result of a private appeal, was able to forward £205, as a contribution from England towards the cost of erecting a Brahmo School at Calcutta for the higher education of girls. With the view of meeting the religious needs of liberal-minded Mohammedans in India, the Committee arranged with Mr. Sahai, through Professor Chatterjee, of Allahabad, for the translation of the following pamphlets into Urdu, the literary language of Mohammedans:—"Our Unitarian Gospel," by Dr. M. J. Savage; "The Faith of a Free Church," by Dr. S. M. Crothers; "A Rational View of the Bible," by Rev. C. J. Street; and "The Bible and Modern Criticism," by Rev. J. Frederick Smith. Professor Chatterjee has worked most cordially with the Committee in many ways. Through him large numbers of University graduates have procured and studied Mr. Armstrong's excellent book "God and the Soul." The demand for Unitarian books and pamphlets from all parts of India shows no signs of decreasing, though no methods of advertising are adopted beyond what people learn from each other. From Jan. 1 to Sept. 30, 675 books and 7,466 pamphlets, to the value of of £91, have been distributed, in response to requests received at Essex Hall. The work carried on in the Khasi Hills, and by Mr. Akbar Masih, of Banda, proceeds on the same lines as heretofore. The Rev. William Roberts, of Madras, died on Sept. 19, at the advanced age of eighty-two. He was an earnest, simple-minded man, well spoken of by all who knew him, who endeavoured to do his duty as a native missionary to the best of his ability. For many years past the Committee have been well aware that the day had gone by when Unitarianism in a great city like Madras could be adequately represented by the movement of which Mr. Roberts was the head. The modest grant of £28 a year was continued out of respect for an old and venerated minister, but with a clear and emphatic intimation that so far as the B. and F. U. A. is concerned, there was no intention of appointing his son or anyone else as his successor.

[The report then gave particulars of Deputations which had attended District Meetings, and of the Autumnal Meetings at Newcastle-on-Tyne, recently reported in these columns.]

Association Sunday.—Circular letters have been issued to ministers or secretaries of congregations throughout the country inviting them to join in making a collection on behalf of the funds of the Association on Sunday, Nov. 16, or if that date proves inconvenient, on another date. Last year 207 congregations contributed the sum of £575, the largest number of congregations and the largest amount collected since the establishment of "Association Sunday" in 1883. An earnest appeal for assistance is made to all who prize their Unitarian principles and faith. The Association is a working missionary organisation, and there is great need and a large opportunity for its work at the present time; and the Committee rely on the co-operation of the congregations to help them to strengthen and extend its good work at home and abroad.

The International Council.—The arrangements for the meetings next year of the International Council of Unitarian and other liberal religious thinkers and workers are already well in hand; and the Committee of the B. and F.U.A., in happy remembrance of the splendid gatherings held in London in May, 1901, have promised to render the promoters every possible assistance. The meetings will be held at Amsterdam, Holland, beginning on Tuesday, Sept. 1, and ending on Friday, Sept. 4. The Rev. Samuel A. Eliot, D.D., President of the American Unitarian Association, the Rev. J. H. Crooker, D.D., and the Rev. C. W. Wendte will attend along with others from America; representatives from Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Hungary, Italy, Switzerland, and other countries have undertaken to be present and to take part in the proceedings. A numerous and representative attendance of the Unitarians of Great Britain and Ireland is expected. Amsterdam is easy of access, and there will be special excursions at cheap rates, while arrangements for hotels and lodgings at very moderate charges will be announced early next year. It is hoped that a great many people will thus be induced to attend. English, French, German, and Dutch will be spoken, so that those who know only one language will find no difficulty. Addresses will be delivered and papers read by several distinguishsd men belonging to various sections of the liberal religious world. The President is Dr. Oort, of Leiden, known to Unitarians in this country by his contributions to the "Bible for Young People"; the Local Secretary is Professor Eerdmans, the successor of the late Dr. Kuenen, who attended the London meetings. The local committee purpose organising visits to The Hague, Leiden, and other historic places, and visitors who can spend a longer time in Holland will find plenty to interest them.

Obituary.—The Committee deeply regret the loss which the Council and the Unitarian community have sustained by the death of the Rev. E. S. Anthony, Lady Bowring, Mr. Frank Taylor, and Mr. I. M. Wade, all of whom were valued members of the Association. Lady Bowring and Mr. Wade had both reached a ripe old age, beloved and honoured by all who knew them for their loyalty to principle, and for the willing and devoted services they had rendered. Mr. Anthony, one of the younger ministers, was taken away in the midst of his work when his powers were at their best; this was also true of Mr. Frank Taylor, one of the most active and earnest of our Unitarian laity, whose death leaves a gap which it is impossible for anyone else to fulfil. All four were for many years familiar figures at Unitarian meetings, and they have left behind them memories fragrant with inspiration and blessing.

The CHAIRMAN referred to the loss sustained by the death of the Rev. E. S. Anthony, Lady Bowring, Mr. Frank Taylor, and Mr. I. M. Wade, members of the Council, and moved a resolution of sympathy with their families, speaking of the services each had rendered to the common cause. This was seconded by Mr. C. F. PEARSON, who spoke especially of Mr. Wade's enthusiastic work, and supported by the Rev. J. HARWOOD, who recalled instances of Mr. Frank Taylor's unfailing zeal.

The resolution having been unanimously passed, the report was accepted; and in the course of subsequent questions the Secretary stated that the President of the American Unitarian Association hoped next year to reach this country in time for the Whitsuntide meetings.

The following resolution, moved from the CHAIR and seconded by the Rev. W. G. TARRANT, was then passed:—

That in the opinion of this Council the Government Education Bill is not conceived in the true interests of Education, inasmuch as it proposes to support denominational schools out of the rates without giving the ratepayers adequate control, deprives the ratepayers of the power of placing women upon representative educational Boards, cuts down the existing educational machinery, and abolishes School Boards without any mandate from the constituencies. The Council further protests against the imposition of theological tests upon teachers in schools supported by the rates and taxes.

The last clause was added, on the suggestion of Mr. RICHARD ROBINSON, to the resolution, of which notice had been given.

In the discussion the following also took part:—Sir R. K. Wilson (who said he should not vote, but advocated universal denominational schools and no State aid), Mr. Stannus, Rev. J. Harwood, Miss Lucas, Rev. H. W. Perris, and Mr. S. S. Tayler.

In the absence of the Rev. Charles Hargrove, the CHAIRMAN also moved, Mr. TAYLER seconded, and it was agreed:—

That in view of the fitting celebration of the centenary of Dr. Priestley's death in 1904, the Executive Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association are invited to take into consideration the question of preparing and publishing a new edition of his Memoirs with explanatory notes.

There being no matters of emergency, the meeting then terminated.

LONDON DISTRICT UNITARIAN SOCIETY.

THE autumn meeting of this Society was held at Essex Hall on Tuesday evening, and was largely attended by members and friends, who were received by Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence, Bart., M.P., the President, and Miss A. J. Lawrence, in the absence of Lady Durning-Lawrence through indisposition. The first part of the evening was devoted to sociability, and the occasion was taken to offer a welcome to the Rev. J. H. Wicksteed, the newly-appointed district minister of the Society.

The PRESIDENT having taken the chair, an opening hymn was sung, and the Secretary, Mr. CLENNELL, reported letters of regret for absence from the Revs. P. H. Wicksteed, F. K. Freeston, and J. Ellis and Mr. H. Chatfeild Clarke. Mr. Wicksteed offered his good wishes for the new departure in the work of the Society.

The PRESIDENT, in his opening address, expressed on behalf of Lady Durning-Lawrence her great regret that she had not been able to be present, and also regretted that the President of the B. and F.U.A., Mr. Armstrong, was prevented by illness from being with them. He then made feeling allusion to the late I. M. Wade and Robert Spears as enthusiastic and strenuous workers in the cause, whose memory he could not but recall as they welcomed a new missionary into the field. Times changed, he said, in the direction of a wider knowledge, which made for men of broader views. They no longer believed in the fall of man but in his rise, and therefore they had hope as they welcomed Mr. Joseph Wicksteed to that work.

The Rev. W. COPELAND BOWIE, as a brother minister and, in the absence of the the President, on behalf of the B. and F.U.A., joined in the welcome. Mr. Wicksteed, he said, was coming to London, that great and wonderful city, where wealth and poverty, knowledge and ignorance, religion and indifference were massed together as never before. He was coming to work as a Unitarian minister, to devote himself to upholding, spreading, defending the high ideals of a pure, noble, rational and progressive religious faith; to put all his strength of mind, character and enthusiasm into the work of touching and kindling the mind, heart, and conscience of some few, at least, in that great community; to inspire them with a passion for truth, liberty, and religion. It was a tremendous task from which the strongest man might well shrink, and yet so helpful and necessary, that there was no other service to which a brave and good man might so profitably devote his life. They must remember that their duty was not merely to welcome Mr. Wicksteed, but to consecrate themselves afresh to that great cause of truth, liberty and religion. He hoped Mr. Wicksteed would make great demands upon them, ministers and members of the churches alike, and quicken within all of them a deeper sense of responsibility, a higher conception of duty and a nobler passion for its fulfilment in the community. Their interest must be shown in a willingness to work with devotion and self-sacrifice in the cause, for the love of God and the service of man.

Mr. W. BLAKE ODGERS, K.C., also joined in the welcome, and said there was no one he could more gladly welcome to London than Mr. Wicksteed and his wife. He recalled, as Mr. Bowie had done, the good stock from which Mr. Wicksteed came, his ancestor, Philip Henry, one of the ejected ministers of 1662, and the good old Puritan traditions; his grandfathers, Charles Wicksteed and Henry Solly; and his father, Philip Wicksteed. But he was to be welcomed also for his own sake, for what he had been at college, as a teacher in a Board-school, and as a Unitarian minister in the North. He must not only be welcomed but supported. It was no light task to which he came, to speak to the working men of London of higher things, but there was a great opportunity for a fearless, zealous, sympathetic man such as he. He welcomed Mr. Wicksteed with all his heart.

The Rev. J. H. WICKSTEED, in acknowledging the welcome, dwelt upon the necessity for genuine belief to make their religion true. So soon as religion ceased to be thought of as truth, and truth of the greatest importance, it ceased to be religion. They had a faith which they believed to be true. That Unitarian faith was not of their own invention, nor was it a discovery even of their ancestors hundreds of years ago; it had been evolved in the slow growth of man, out of the heart of human nature: the great faith that God is One. That they believed to be true, but had not yet stated it as it might be stated. They recognised that the form of truth must ever change, and be open to restatement and receptive of the new thought of the age. Because of that faith of theirs they were closer to the fundamental truths of religion than others who still clung to old forms out of which the life was gone. Their faith did not divide, but united all, the faith that the unseen almighty Power is the greatest thing for man to know. In devoting their lives to bring themselves and others nearer to that unseen, almighty Spirit, they were fulfilling the highest purpose of their being. Religion was not a statement of abstract truth, but must be full of life. As with the men of old who were worshippers of the sun, there must be strength and reality in their faith; as they recognised the great source of warmth and light and life, so they must look to the Eternal source of all life; and as there were those who were devoted to the touching worship of Christ, looking to him as God, so they, recognising that almighty power could not be confined to one human soul, must look beyond to the Eternal humanity in God. Such was their Unitarian faith, not always easy to grasp, but underlying all religion, carrying them back from the shows of life, to the source of all being and of all goodness. According to the object of that Society, he was there to call the Unitarians of London to make increased efforts on behalf of the faith they professed. It was a beautiful and holy work to which they welcomed him. He could not be alone in it, for they would be with him; and above all, they must not forget, that with them was the Eternal God, whom to serve and worship was life eternal.

The Rev. W. G. TARRANT, moving a resolution of welcome to other new-comers to London pulpits, made touching allusion to another true and sympathetic friend—the late Miss Durning-Smith—to whose generous thoughtfulness it was due that they were able to take that new departure in the work of their Society. The Committee, of which he was chairman, had entered on a bold policy, and was spending the capital sum which had been placed in their hands, confident that as the work was seen to germinate friends would recognise the need, and provide the further funds for its proper maintenance. There were thirty of their churches in the London district, or, with Acton, thirty-one, and the need of further extension was very great. There would be altogether seven new-comers to their pulpits during the year—the Revs. John Ellis, at Mansford-street; R. H. Greaves, at Highgate; W. H. Rose, at Walthamstow; Gordon Cooper, helping Mr. Freeston at Essex Church; Eustace Thompson, at Bermondsey; Henry Gow, about to settle at Hampstead; and George Critchley, at Kentish Town. (Mr. C. A. Ginever, it was afterwards added, was settling at Stepney, making eight in all.) The heartiest welcome was offered to all these. With high hope and deep faith in God and renewed consecration they must go forward. In that spirit, he concluded, "let us give ourselves to our ministry."

Mr. DAVID MARTINEAU seconded, with words of brave confidence that although the veterans passed from the field, the needed workers would be always found, and that the work must be pushed on.

The Rev. GEORGE CRITCHLEY responded, and while acknowledging the welcome on behalf of all the ministers, spoke especially as a new-comer into the denomination. He was one of those who had come seeking a home and resting-place, and a sphere of work. They had come by devious ways, some of them very rugged and sorrowful, and the shelter offered them at the wide door, first of their intellectual charity, and, second, at the still wider door of their human kindness and sympathy, had been grateful and cheering in a very high degree. Whether they had many or only few years' of work in store they trusted that they would be able to show their gratitude for kindness, not in words only, but by being of some real and solid service to the churches and to liberal religion in London.

A vote of thanks to the President and to the ladies, and to Mr. John Harrison for his services at the organ, was passed on the motion of the Rev. J. E. STRONGE, seconded by Mr. CLENNELL, and the meeting closed with the Doxology and Benediction.

NORTH MIDLAND PRESBYTERIAN AND UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

THE annual meeting took place in the Elder-yard Chapel, Chesterfield, on Wednesday, Oct. 22. A service was held in the chapel, conducted by the Rev. Peter Dean, of Loughborough, and a powerful sermon was preached by the Rev. W. H. Drummond, of Belfast, laying stress upon the fact that our mission must be especially to that numerous class of people who have lost their hold upon the Christian interpretation of life. At present a great opportunity is open to us, but if we do not seize it, then opportunity will harden into judgment. In conclusion, he urged the need in our community of more corporate Church life.

At the subsequent business meeting, the President, Mr. J. HARROP WHITE took the chair, and the Secretary, the Rev. H. Gow, read the report of the Committee, from which it appeared that a busy and uselful year's work had been accomplished.

The PRESIDENT, in moving the adoption of the report, said they had that morning added a clause to it, placing on record their high appreciation of the services Mr. Gow had rendered to the Association as secretary for the past nearly ten years. They congratulated him, and wished him every success in his new work at Hampstead. Turning to the work of the Association, he said he thought it desirable that at their meetings questions which might be considered semi-political, but more particularly of a social and moral character—such questions, for instance, as peace and war, gambling, intemperance, the housing of the working classes, and education—should be discussed. With the view of ascertaining what was the practice in other similar associations throughout the country he had addressed an inquiry to fifteen district associations, and from the replies he had received it appeared that one was purely a missionary association; in three others such discussion would be allowed, and in the remaining ten such questions had been considered, and in some cases subjects of a more political character had been brought forward. In eight cases out of the ten they had discussed or intended to discuss the education question. His personal opinion was that it was the duty of Unitarians to take a leading part in all questions of social reform. A selfish man could have no influence for good, and the same remark applied to Churches or associations. He was not urging that a religious organisation should throw itself into the vortex of party politics, and they might not all agree on specific political questions, but they could all surely be of one mind with regard to the question of providing healthy homes for the people and of ensuring for the worker a fair return for his daily toil, and a reasonable competence in his old age. They could unite surely in trying to make the lives of men more happy, more temperate, more moral, and more God-like. That was the true aim of religious and political reform. The Church which declared the brotherhood of man should take a lead in these questions. Anything affecting the physical, the moral, and the religious welfare of the people, or affecting the rights and privileges of their Churches, and the principles which they held dear, might justly and properly become subjects for discussion at meetings such as that. As to the Education Bill, it was an attack upon Nonconformity as a whole, and they ought to be united in their resistance.

In the evening a conference was held, when the Rev. W. WHITAKER read an exceptionally able paper on Hopes and Fears for the National Conference.

The British and Foreign Unitarian Association, he said, had faithfully and without prejudice succoured our weaker Churches, and had provided a valuable means of such organic unity as we had hitherto been capable of. The movement had the good qualities and defects which characterised Liberalism in general in the nineteenth century. But now there was a call for something more. The arguments, however, put forward to justify the supersession of the older Association by the Conference were not conclusive, as usually stated. The strongest was that drawn from the need of more unity and closer relationships among our Churches. This was a pressing need which, in strict theory, if that were all, the B. and F.U.A. could not properly meet; whereas in actual practice it had achieved in this direction as much as the Churches seemed ready for.

The other ordinary argument is not so good; it seems to consist in a craving for a more logically consistent kind of freedom. But freedom in vacuo is not a thing for which we shall consent to make great sacrifices. But the fact is the question is much larger than this in every way. The call for the Conference with its more spacious welcome and freer scope is part of a larger awakening which we share with the world in general. It cannot but be evident to us that we have fallen behind; that our theological controversies have been a beating of the air, a slaying of straw men. Both the common orthodoxy and the Unitarianism which combats it are on the same plane, whereas the significant movement, the transition in belief, which is going forward in the world, is a transition from an unreflective picture-religion (orthodox and Unitarian) to a thoroughly and consciously rationalised faith. Our watchword must be, not "simplification," but "intensity of faith."

The subsequent discussion, in which the Revs. H. Gow, J. Harwood, E. I. Fripp, Lloyd Thomas, Messrs. J. C. Warren, and Harrop White took part, was well sustained. Mr. Harwood was present as representative of the B. and F.U.A.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Bedfield.—Last Sunday and Monday were festival days, the preachers on Sunday being the Revs. W. Wilson and A. Amey. On Monday the public tea and anuual meeting took place, under the presidency of Miss Tagart, when the speakers were Mrs. Summers, the Revs. W. Wilson and A. Amey, and Messrs. Dowsing and Shrubsole.

Bootle.—On Sunday week the Rev. J. Morley Mills preached in the Free Church on "Religion and Education," fully reported in the local Press, and at the conclusion of the service a resolution condemning the Education Bill was unanimously passed.

Boston.—On Sunday week Mr. W. H. Shrubsole, at the afternoon meeting of the Congregationalist "Men's Own Society," and in the evening preached in Spain-lane Chapel. On the following evening, in the Shodfriars Hall, he delivered his popular lecture, "Curious Dwellers on our Shores."

Bridport.—The question of establishing a guild here has for some time engaged the attention of the Sunday-school teachers, and the determination to do this was finally arrived at after a visit from the Rev. John Ellis, Secretary of the National Conference Guilds' Union, who preached the Sunday-school sermons, and gave an address on "Guilds" on the following Monday evening. A meeting was accordingly called on Oct. 7, and was well attended by teachers, elder scholars, and others. The course followed was practically that suggested by the Rev. Joseph Wood, of Birmingham, in his excellent "Hints How to Form a Guild." The preliminary resolutions were passed, a name was chosen, "Bridport Unitarian Chapel Guild of Good Service," the minimum age for full membership was fixed at fifteen, and then officers and a provisional committee were appointed to draft rules, enrol members, and carry on work for three months, and then report to a general meeting. The first service of the guild was held on Oct. 22, and was well attended. The Guilds' Union Manual was used, the music for the responses being kindly supplied by Mr. Wood. Three sub-committees have so far been appointed, one to start a gymnasium for boys, another to revive meetings for readings and discussions, and a third to arrange for an open social evening. The present intention is to have quarterly meetings of all members for business, and monthly religious services at which no business will be done except the admission of new members.

Chorley.—A Sale of Work was held on Wednesday week in the Park-street School, to provide funds to meet the cost of the new organ which is being erected in the chapel, estimated at £140. The sale was opened by Mrs. Crompton, of Rivington Hall, the chair, in the absence of the Rev. A. Doel, through illness, being taken by the Rev. W. J. Payling Wright, Congregationalist minister, who acknowledged his indebtedness to Unitarian writers. Mrs. Crompton recalled the memory of her grandfather, the Rev. H. Clarke, formerly minister of the chapel, and her own early experiences in playing the organ there. The sale was continued on Saturday, and realised £67 in all.

Chowbent.—On Tuesday evening, Oct. 21, Mr. John Harwood, of Manchester, gave a recital of "The Cricket on the Hearth." There was a very large audience, including the members of the Atherton Literary Society, and representative members of nearly all the churches. For two hours, with only short pauses between the chapters, Mr. Harwood held his audience spell-bound, moving it to alternate laughter and tears, as, by voice and gesture and facial expression, the incidents and varied characters of the story were livingly exhibited. As a feat of memory alone the recital was remarkable; as an elocutionary exercise it was simply marvellous, while its educational value, especially to the young people of the "Guild," under whose auspices the recital was promoted, can scarcely be estimated.

Cradley (Appointment).—The Rev. A. H. Shelley has received and accepted a cordial invitation to the pastorate of Park-lane Chapel.

Croydon.—At the request of the Croydon District Trades' and Labour Council, Citizen Sunday was again kept at the Free Christian Church. Most of the working-class societies of the town marched, in the afternoon, with their banners, regalia, and music, to the church, which was filled to overflowing. A hearty and enthusiastic service was held, and the minister, Mr. J. Page Hopps, gave a practical and plain-spoken address on "How to make the Rich and Poor Pull Together."

East London Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The first meeting of the session was held at Stepney on Saturday, Oct. 25. A paper, entitled "A Talk about Guilds," was read by the Rev. John Ellis, of Mansford-street, in which he urged the importance of guilds in promoting a deeper religious feeling in connection with the church. There were sixteen present, representing Stepney, Mansford-street, and Stratford.

Framlingham.—Another anniversary was celebrated on Sunday last, when the service in the morning was conducted by the Rev. W. Wilson, and in the evening by the Rev. A. Amey. On Tuesday there was a Sale of Work, public tea, and a subsequent meeting, over which Miss Tagart presided. Mrs. Summers, the Rev. A. Amey, and Messrs. S. J. Hutley and W. H. Shrubsole, F.G.S., gave interesting addresses.

Halstead: Essex.—The Free Christian Church was well filled on Sunday evening last. After devotional exercises, conducted by Mr. W. H. Shrubsole, F.G.S., Miss Ilona Györy, a distinguished Hungarian writer now on a visit to England, riveted the attention of the congregation for nearly an hour by an eloquent address on "Religion in Hungary." Although this lady has had but few opportunities of addressing public audiences in this country, not a word she uttered seemed to be lost or misunderstood, while the fervour and pathos which found expression in elegant diction, with scarcely any reference to notes, created a very deep impression. The Church Band led the singing and played some excellent music, including that of the Hungarian National Hymn. The collection on behalf of the Band Fund was the largest for that purpose on record.

Hull.—The winter session of the Park-street Literary and Social Union was opened on Oct. 10 by the Rev. James Harwood, B.A., with a lecture on "My Visit to India." On Wednesday, the 22nd inst, the members and friends assembled in response to a cordial invitation from Mr. and Mrs. S. Harris to an "At Home." In the course of much pleasant entertainment, the Rev. F. H. Vaughan addressed a few words of welcome to all present, and spoke with much feeling of the relationship which he trusted would speedily be found to subsist between the society and himself. The Workers' League is looking forward to the commencement of a prosperous session on the 29th, when Mr. and Mrs. Harris hope to receive all those interested in the special work to which this young society has devoted itself so earnestly for some years past.

Leicester: Free Christian Church.—In furtherance of the special effort which the friends here are making for the extinction of the debt remaining on the church and schools, two performances of Shakespeare's A Midsummer Night's Dream, arranged in three acts, were given in the schoolroom on Oct. 23 and 24, to crowded and delighted audiences. Everything connected with the production was done by those associated with the church, including the designing and making the costumes, the painting of the scenery, and the rendering of the incidental music; and the result was a very beautiful and harmonious rendering of the play. It is intended to give further performances of the play for the same object.

London: Bell-street.—There was a full attendance on Sunday evening at the People's Hall, when the Rev. E. E. Jenkins, who is at present in charge of the mission, preached an earnest sermon on "The Duties of Citizenship."

London: Kentish Town.—On Thursday, Oct. 23, a well-attended meeting of members and friends was held to celebrate the settlement of the Rev. George Critchley, B.A., as pastor of the church at Clarence-road. The proceedings were chiefly social, but a few words of welcome were given by Mr. Armytage Bakewell (chairman), Mr. A. Savage Cooper (secretary), and by the Revs. W. G. Tarrant and T. E. M. Edwards as representing the ministers of London and the local societies. Mr. Critchley, in responding, said he rejoiced to be called to minister to a church whose history had been so honourable, and although he knew, as all knew, that its circumstances had changed of late years, he hoped that by devotion and, if necessary, by changed methods they might rally once more a large congregation, and do a good work in the district. The church building has been recently cleansed, and although much more renovation might be done, it now presents a bright and cheerful appearance. In the schoolroom on Sunday afternoon, Mr. C. E. Maurice read a paper before the Sunday Society, entitled "The Peace Movement Forty Years Ago and Now." In the evening Mr. Critchley preached an eloquent sermon on "Christ as a Citizen."

London: Little Portland-street.—A generous gift of a large number of hymn and service books for the use of visitors during the special services at the chapel has been made by Mr. C. Hawksley, a member of the congregation. On Sunday morning last (Citizen Sunday) the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke preached to a congregation which filled the chapel on "Love as a Dominant Factor in the Solution of Social Problems and the Healing of Social Wounds." On Wednesday evening the first meeting of the winter session of the Congregational Society was held at the Portland Institute, Little Titchfield-street. The Rev. H. S. Perris presided over a large audience, and a lecture was given by the Rev. S. A. Brooke on "The Sea Charm of Venice," illustrating the influence of the sea upon the history, architecture, and arts of the "Bride of the Adriatic." At the next meeting of the Society, on Nov. 19, the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie will open a discussion on the Education Question.

London: Rhyl-street.—A very well-attended debate on the Education Bill took place on Wednesday, Oct. 22, when Mr. Cecil E. Chesterton, of the Fabian Society, spoke very ably in favour of the Bill, and Mr. E. Wilkes Smith, of the Richmond Free Church, as ably against it. A resolution stating that the meeting could not welcome the Bill as an approach to a satisfactory settlement of the education question was unanimously carried, having been supported by Mr. Wilson, who wished the Bill, which had its merits, amended so that all the members of the Education Committee should be members of the County or Borough Councils, and would thus need to be elected; that women should be eligible for election, and that the appointment of the teachers should be in the hands of the Educational Committee. Mrs. Bayle-Bernard has most kindly presented to the Mission a splendid large copy of the Revised Version of the Bible for use in the pulpit.

London: Stamford-street.—The ceremony of unveiling the Band of Hope banner was performed on Oct. 24 by Mrs. Allen, and witnessed by a large number of parents and friends. The Rev. Frederic Allen was in the chair, supported by the Revs. T. E. M. Edwards, R. H. Greaves, Eustace Thompson, and others. The Boys' Own Brigade provided a guard of honour, and the B.O.H. choir gave an excellent programme of music and recitations. The banner formed the basis of many of the speeches, Mr. Menzies (Chairman of the Southwark Band of Hope Union) emphasising one of its mottoes, "Hold fast to that which is good," Mr. Pallister Young admiring the true-blue of the flag, and Mr. Chancellor pointing out the true meaning of a banner. Mr. Bredall reminded the children of their free-birth and consequent duties; Mr. Edwards told them to work as well as cheer, whilst Mr. Marshall urged them to cultivate self-control. Mr. Greaves recited a capital piece, "Mike's Donkey," and after a recitation by Mr. Titford, and a vote of thanks to the visitors, the proceedings terminated.

Newcastle-on-Tyne.—On Thursday, Oct. 23, the session of the Literary Society was opened with a lecture on "Shelley," by the Rev. Frank Walters. Councillor R. Affleck, J.P., occupied the chair, and the schoolroom was completely filled by an audience of more than a hundred. This is the largest number that has ever attended a meeting of the society, and the members are looking forward to a most successful course during the winter. On Sunday evening, Oct. 26, Mr. Walters commenced a course of lectures, his subject being: "Scripture Testimony on the Doctrine of the Trinity." A very large and intelligent congregation assembled, and the special hymns selected from the Essex Hall Hymnal were sung with inspiring heartiness. The Hospital Collections were taken morning and evening, and were largely in excess of those of many previous years. During the month of November, Mr. Walters is to deliver theological lectures at our churches in the counties of Northumberland and Durham, under the auspices of the local association. This winter the experiment is being made of religious services during the week at the Church of the Divine Unity. The first of these was held on Wednesday, when Mr. Walters gave an address on "The Prodigal Son."

Scarborough.—The congregation having decided to adopt the revised Essex Hall Hymnal, the book was used last Sunday for the first time. Some weeks ago one of the oldest members of the congregation suggested the buying of chairs for the schoolroom, and opened the subscription list by the price of a dozen. This idea was heartily taken up and £13 was realised, thus saving the expense of hiring furniture, &c., on the occasion of social meetings, &c.

Southport.—The anniversary services of the Portland-street Church were conducted on Sunday, Oct. 19, by the Rev. E. W. Lummis, of Warrington, and on the following evening the anniversary tea was held, followed by a meeting over which Dr. Wormald presided, when a message of sympathy with the Rev. C. H. Wellbeloved in his illness was sent. The Rev. E. W. Lummis gave an earnest address on the organisation of the churches and the deepening of religious life. Their one object in organisation was to centralise the point of view of the churches, to unify and improve the health of the individual churches and the spiritual health of the members. That scheme of practical organisation should be the central force from which they would derive renewed fervour. They all seemed to be agreed that wonderful as was the good work done by their Unitarian churches, signally sweet and strong and holy as was the character which was specifically characteristic of the Unitarians, still there did exist room for improvement in their Unitarian church. Somehow they were not so numerous or so earnest, and they were not so busy or fervent as they ought to be. Some of them were trying to reach those desiderata by other roads. If there was anything amiss let them see that their religion was more real. They were ever considering what they should do, instead of trying to be kind and pure and spiritual. Let them not try to live by a code, but by a spirit. Let them not try to conform their conduct to any scheme of doctrine, but try to make their spirit conform to the realisation of what they actually knew of God. The chairman, having referred with much sympathy to the illness of their minister, spoke of the Education Bill, which, he said, threatened to undermine Nonconformity. There never was a time when they should more seriously consider their position. They stood for character and liberty. If it meant that their freedom was gone, then the sun of England's glory had set. He had faith from what he knew of the great Nonconformist Churches of the country that the old spirit was not dead yet, and that the public would be educated to the position they were now in, and if this old land was to live it would only be by liberty and freedom. The Rev. Charles Roper urged the necessity for practical religion. They must cultivate true brotherhood and be helpful one to another. They wanted men who would influence their life like Alderman Bowring, of Liverpool, and Alderman Rawson, of Manchester, who had spent a long life of 82 years in the uplifting of his brother-men. Then there was Mr. Monks, of Warrington, and they should be proud they were Unitarians. They could all bring some influence for good to bear on the community. The Rev. A. E. Parry, of Liscard, also spoke, and votes of thanks brought a very pleasant evening to a close.

Sunderland.—A very successful bazaar, having regard to the somewhat limited resources of the congregation, was held in the Park Hall, in aid of a fund of £150 required for the renovation and improvement of the chapel. Mrs. Baxter-Ellis, of Newcastle, opened the bazaar; Mr. T. F. Ward (of Middlesbrough) presiding, and a large number of friends from neighbouring towns contributed to the success of the undertaking, by which a sum of £70 in all was realised. A further sale of work will probably be held at Christmas with a view to raising a substantial portion of the balance.

Swansea.—The first of the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter's six lectures on "The Bible in the Nineteenth Century" was delivered in the Albert Minor Hall to a crowded audience. Some people had to return for want of room. Principal Salmon, of the Swansea Training College, presided, and gave, on behalf of the town, a most cordial welcome to Mr. Carpenter. The audience, which was one of the largest and most attentive Mr. Carpenter has ever had, was deeply impressed.

Torquay.—A Sale of Work, with the object of extinguishing the debt on the Church Funds, was held at Unity Hall on Oct. 22 and 23. The sale was opened on the first day by Mrs. W. H. Herford, the Rev. A. E. O'Connor presiding; and on the second day by Mrs. Brine, who, alluding to the Education Bill, said that the control which parents were at present able to exercise over the education of their children would be very materially lessened if the Bill came into law. The local interest felt in public education would also decline when School Boards were replaced by a more centralised authority, such as the County Councils. The results of the sale fully realised the anticipations of the promoters, and the debt has been cleared off.

Trowbridge.—The annual tea and congregational meeting were held on Wednesday week, and the occasion was taken to welcome the Rev. J. and Mrs. Wain home from their honeymoon. Mr. W. Walker presided, and among those present were the Rev. E. Turland, of Newbury, and the Rev. A. J. Pearse (Congregationalist). A presentation of a purse of gold was made to Mr. and Mrs. Wain by Mrs. J. Purnell, on behalf of the congregation, and feelingly acknowledged by Mr. Wain. On the following evening a further presentation of an ornamental iron flower stand was made by the members of the Sewing Society, at the first meeting of the season, held at the Conigre Parsonage; and on Sunday afternoon the teachers and scholars of the Sunday-school added their gift, a musical cabinet, with a suitable inscription on a silver plate.

"THE name of Hibbert has for a good many years been associated with the intellectual study of religion, and a safe prophecy may now be made that this association will be strengthened and perpetuated by the Hibbert Journal." So we read at the beginning of a leading article, which fills a column and a half of the Liverpool Daily Post of October 23, and offers a cordial welcome to the new quarterly. The distinctive principles of the Hibbert Journal are stated with hearty approval, and the interest and value of the contents of the first number recognised, the articles by Professor Percy Gardner and Mr. Stopford Brooke being singled out for special notice. Remarking on the scope offered by the new Review for useful discussions and investigations, the Daily Post adds the following suggestive sentences:—

In the present day the whole educated population may probably be divided into those who in what is sometimes called a "healthy" way leave dogma alone and take orthodoxy for granted, and those who, recognising the inevitable importance of the things expressed by theological phrases, desire to be rid of conventionality and to understand with what meaning and with what authority such expressions were originally used. There is real enjoyment to minds of the thoughtful type in getting to the bottom truth of dogmatic commonplaces. In the Hibbert Journal, we may be quite sure, there will be no ruthless iconoclasm, nor any light disturbance of cherished ideas. And, in fact, the majority of cherished ideas owe the cherishing to their merits. But neither they nor the cherishing of them is any the better for being inaccurately based. Clear away from them all such apparent but fallacious support, and they will be stronger rather than weaker, while the true meaning of the thesis or dicta which they are supposed to have been partly built on will develop other ideas of worth; for in all sacred sayings seriously analysed there is permanent value.

Readers who love thrilling romance will feel under a debt of gratitude to

Mr. FRED M. WHITE

for his New Story,

A Shadowed Love,

which will commence this week in

THE CHRISTIAN WORLD.

The New Story will introduce the readers of this great Religious Weekly to an author who has not yet been represented in its pages. "A Shadowed Love," we believe, will put its readers on very good terms with Mr. Fred M. White. It is a story quite out of the common, with a lovely blind heroine, around whom centres a tragic mystery. A struggling young novelist and journalist, living with his sister in London, renders a great service to the heroine's father, who is haunted by mortal fear of some imminent peril arising out of a dark chapter in his past. Dick Stevenson, scenting a mystery, begins to wonder whether there is material for a novel in it, but he soon finds himself a leading actor in a drama more startling and fuller of thickly crowding surprises than any story he had ever ventured to imagine. Those readers who pride themselves on foreseeing the end of a novel from the beginning will find themselves baffled for once. Mr. Fred M. White knows how to keep his secret, and we anticipate that as the story progresses there will be impatient waiting, after each instalment, for the continuation in tens of thousands of homes. As the title implies, the love element is prominent, and the love story told is as fragrant as the favourite violets of the sightless heroine. "A Shadowed Love" is a strong, wholesome romance for tired fathers and mothers, to enable them to shake off the cares of the day during the coming winter evenings, but it may be put without fear into the hands of the younger members of the family.

Yorkshire Training School of Physical Culture.

The above School was opened more than two years ago with the object of providing a centre in the North of England for the professional training of educated women in the Swedish system of Physical Culture.

The minimum cost is of two years' duration, and includes the Study of Physiology, Anatomy, Hygiene, Chemistry, Elementary Pathology, Theory of Movements, Practical Subjects, as Gymnastics, Fencing, Swimming, Games, &c.

That such a centre is needed seems to be proved by the fact that the first student trained by this School was, on the completion of her course, appointed under the Bradford Board as Instructress on Physical Culture to their schools.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

"A MANUSCRIPT Life of Christ of about A.D. 1425" is the subject of a most interesting article, with considerable extracts from the old MS., which we hope to publish next week.

THE Dean of Ripon's address on "Natural Christianity," given, as we reported last week, to the "Churchmen's Union for the Advancement of Liberal Religious Thought," has naturally given rise to some indignant, if not very intelligent comment. The Daily News, in a note on the Dean's "amazing speech," quotes Canon Knox Little, as follows :—

I hope Dean Fremantle has been misrepresented. The words attributed to him are deplorable. A Christianity without the Virgin Birth, without miracles, without the resurrection, is not Christianity at all. Such utterances are inconsistent with the position of any Christian man, much more of one divinely commissioned to teach and a dignitary of the Church of England. These scandalous heresies are only crude revivals of the earlier and now exploded German rationalism.

And the Guardian, which reprints from The Times a summary of the address, has this comment :—

In his anxiety to provide a form of Christianity which will be palatable to everybody, Dr. Fremantle seems to be prepared to abandon all belief in the Virgin Birth and to reduce the Resurrection to an unreality. The effect of such teaching is not, as Dr. Fremantle imagines, to strengthen the Church, but to drive men either into scepticism or into Romanism; nor is it possible, in our opinion, to reconcile it with even the loosest interpretation of the Creeds. We feel bound to protest against such utterances, whether they come from critics like Dr. Cheyne, who appeal to students, or from teachers who, like Dr. Fremantle, address themselves to more popular audiences.

CANON KNOX LITTLE would not probably recognise any difference between "exploded German rationalism" and a reverent attempt in the light of modern knowledge to re-interpret the facts of the spiritual life of man and the early Christian records; and it is hardly necessary to say that Dr. Fremantle did not deny the resurrection of the living Christ. What he denied was the miraculous re-appearance of the crucified mortal body. The doctrine of the Virgin Birth he was, indeed, prepared to leave an open question, and if Churchmen cannot imagine a Christianity without it they must be allowed their outcry against "scandalous heresy"; but the Dean did not reduce the Resurrection to an unreality—he established it upon its true spiritual foundation.

THE National Union of Women Workers met in Conference at Edinburgh last week, under the presidency of Lady Battersea, when a number of valuable papers were read, and questions specially affecting the well-being of women and children were discussed. Miss Melville, of University Hall, St. Andrews, and Miss Sellar, of Lady Margaret Hall, Oxford, dealt with the subject of University life for women, the former deploring the growing utilitarianism of the students, lacking a scholarly ideal of liberal culture, the latter affirming that University life and the bicycle had added very greatly to the happiness of women. She held that the give and take of corporate life developed qualities in which women were supposed to be lacking, and produced a wider feeling of social responsibility. Strong pleas were made on behalf of wage-earning children, and a paper read by Miss Mary Dendy on the "Permanent Care of the Feeble-Minded" made a deep impression. The subject of amusements was also dealt with in a thoroughly wholesome manner. Lady Battersea was re-elected President.

PROTESTS of the most vigorous description have again been made against the Education Bill by leading statesmen. Lord Rosebery, speaking at Edinburgh on Saturday afternoon, renewed the appeal for a conference between representative men of all parties and sects, so that a just and equitable arrangement might be devised in place of the ill-omed measure now before Parliament. Incidentally he adroitly quoted the Times in support of the contention that representation should follow taxation. It appears that while that journal supports the Government's unfair policy with regard to the management of rate-supported denominational schools, it is shocked that the business of the Port of London should be placed beyond the direct control of those who "pay the piper." On the same day Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, Mr. Asquith, and other leading Liberals attended a great meeting at the Alexandra Palace, and the utmost enthusiasm was stirred by their denunciation of the Bill. Earl Spencer, speaking at Derby on Friday, specially referred to the absurdity of the proposal to add the care of education, in all its branches as contemplated by the Bill, to those already burdensome to the County Councils. He was of opinion, from long experience of County Councils, that the notion of their being likely to be elected to look after educational interests was a delusion and a snare.

MORE significant, possibly, than many speeches were the results in the municipal contests last Saturday. The introduction of the education question into these elections cannot be deprecated as that of ordinary imperial politics may be, for it is the avowed object of the Bill to bring the popularly elected local authorities into vital connection with the schools. The answer of the electorate is unmistakable. If it cannot be said that the Education Bill proved a universal obstacle to Conservative candidates, it is certain that it was the deciding consideration in many cases; and the Liberal gains were numerous. As we write an interesting Parliamentary contest is going on in the East Toxteth Division, Liverpool, where two of the Liberal municipal victories were won on Saturday. There appears to be a cleavage for once in the Conservative ranks; if opposition to the Education Bill suffices to carry Mr. Herbert Rathbone through the breach into the vacant seat we shall, for more than one reason, rejoice.

THE closure system has been freely adopted in the House of Commons these last few days, Mr. Balfour's patience being limited, like any other man's—even a Nonconformist's. In the course of debate on Clause 8 on Thursday week he would not consent to a provision that the denominational schools might be engaged free of charge for electioneering purposes, and proceeded to strike out page after page of amendments by insisting on successive sections of the clause being voted. Subsequently he was moved to great warmth of indignation by the ingratitude of the Opposition, especially Nonconformists, for the Government concession in respect to pupil-teachers, to whom appointments would be thrown open irrespective of denomination. He failed to see the force of the contention that if this was bare justice to pupil-teachers it was equally so to assistants generally. Of course, he had his way, and by Friday night the whole clause, as amended, was passed. The amendments accepted have undoubtedly given a slightly better colour to the clause; but we need not detail them here, partly because they do not vitally alter the Bill, which would be necessary to make it a good one, and partly because we have already noted several of them during the fortnight that the clause has been under debate. There was, however, one very important addition made on Friday night which merits special attention outside, and which certainly proved of deepest interest inside the House of Commons.

THIS particular amendment was moved as an addition to Section (2), which deals with the determination of differences arising between the "local education authority" and the "managers," the determining power being given to the Board of Education. Colonel Kenyon-Slaney moved to add these words:—

Religious instruction shall be given in a school not provided by the local education authority in accordance with the tenour of the provisions (if any) of the trust deed relating thereto, and shall be under the control of the managers.

His speech made it evident that this provision was aimed against the proselytizing efforts of individual clergymen holding "extreme views." "This amendment," he said, "did not convey any slight upon the clergy, but was merely intended to safeguard the rights of the Anglican laymen and the rights of their community." Sir William Anson having accepted it on behalf of the Government, a series of protests were made by members representing the high clerical party. When Mr. Balfour rose to defend the action of the Government in accepting the amendment, he soon got into a heated colloquy with his High Church relation Lord Hugh Cecil, who resented the placing of this impediment in the way of the "extreme" clergy. The Prime Minister, to quote the report,

Put the question to the hon. members who had objected to the amendment, What had raised almost all the difficulties in the public mind connected with religious teaching in the schools? It was the abuse here and there by clergymen of the powers given them. The harm that that had done to the whole cause of religious education in our public elementary schools was not to be measured by words. The follies and indiscretions of a single individual were multiplied by public rumour till they almost stood out as a great public danger. Was it wise to leave a system in existence which brought the whole scheme of national education into discredit? It was because he desired to see those dangers removed for ever from the path of denominational education that he was anxious to see the amendment accepted.

In a subsequent speech Mr. Balfour spoke of the "remarkable phenomenon" now observable, as the Bill was getting to be "better understood"—namely, that the very clerical party in whose interests the Bill was said to have been framed were now complaining of being insulted by it! Well, the debate was certainly remarkable, for it showed that, Tory or not Tory, the members of the House of Commons as a whole do not like clergy of "extreme views."

BY midnight on Tuesday Clauses 9, 10, and 11 had been passed by the help of the closure, after short and decidedly inadequate discussion. Clause 9 determines the conditions under which new schools may be provided. Public notice must be given, and then three months are allowed for appeal by interested parties, including "any ten ratepayers." Clause 10 declares the principles upon which the Board of Education shall decide such appeals. They are to have regard (1) to the interests of secular instruction, (2) to the wishes of the parents, and (3) to the economy of the rates, and no existing school is to be considered "unnecessary" in which an average attendance of thirty scholars is secured. The deplorable tendencies of these enactments are obvious. The effective progress of education is to be clearly at the mercy of any handful of persons anxious to save rates rather than to develop human lives; or, as Dr. Macnamara pointed out, opposition from obsequious "parents" can be easily got up to block the way. It is quite consistent with the general spirit of the Bill that encouragement should be given in the interest of denominationalism to the continuance of tiny schools of thirty scholars, instead of aiming at the establishment of a system of larger centres, in which adequate equipment could more reasonably be secured. Despite the earnest appeals of men of high repute on the Government side of the House Mr. Balfour has declined to alter these pernicious proposals. On Wednesday the Committee took up the consideration of Clause 12, which deals with the appointment of the Education Committees, as to which Mr. Balfour said the Government had an open mind. What followed we must record next week.

MR. STOPFORD BROOKE'S study of the "Poetry of Robert Browning," of which we are glad to see a second edition is already announced, is the subject of a warmly appreciative review in last week's Spectator, which speaks of the book as one "that requires special and peculiar notice at the hands of the public by reason of its high literary value, its acute insight into the principles of literary production, and its judicial estimate of one of the greatest of our poets." We quote the concluding paragraph of the review:—

That Browning will be more and more read as days go by we have little doubt. His extraordinary gifts of portraiture, his piercing insight into the workings of the human soul, his love of, his belief in, humanity, his unfaltering faith in the immortality of man and in the perfect love and justice of God, appeal to us all in a way that makes us turn to him despite the many thousands of lines that he left unblotted or unpolished, despite his disregard of that mechanism of art which, when he chose, he used with such effect. The man who teaches us in all sincerity to welcome each rebuff of life, to look always, not down, but up; who insists that "man partly is and wholly hopes to be," and believes in no mute immortality, but that we shall "fight on, fare ever there as here," is a man too near the divine aspirations of mankind for man to forget him. Therefore we welcome Mr. Stopford Brooke's admirable analysis and stirring criticism of Browning's incomparable work, and venture to express the hope that having now completed full and elaborate studies of Tennyson and Browning, he will filch time from his other work to give the world some generalised essays on the functions of criticism.

ONE of the younger Methodist papers dealt somewhat vigorously the other day with an exceedingly important problem of New Testament exegesis, the teaching of the New Testament in regard to Poverty and Wealth. Provoked by Dr. Orello Cone's book on the subject, the writer charged the critics of the Liberal school with delighting in theological heresy, but avoiding with extreme care any suspicion of heresy in economics. The notion of a theologic revolution is contemplated by them with much complacency; but the suggestion of a social and economic revolution is carefully excluded; in these matters, when due allowance is made for special temporary and local circumstances, they give us to understand that present practices are fairly in accord, or could without much change be put into accord, with early Christian principles. The story of Luther is itself sufficient to remind us that a man may be very progressive in regard to abstract doctrines, and more than conservative enough in regard to things political. But one would not imagine that any higher critic would feel bound to adopt a low or apologetic tone in regard to the question of the Christian view of wealth. It is certain that on no subject is New Testament teaching more emphatic or more clear.

THE possession of riches is represented as a hindrance to him who, already good and lovable, wished to be perfect. The parable of the rich man and Lazarus exaggerates a similar idea. The care of this world and the deceitfulness of riches choke the word. A man who asked Christ to help him to obtain only a fair share of his patrimony (or what he believed would be fair) was warned, with all those near him, to beware of covetousness; as if it were a dangerous state of mind to be in for a man to desire even his dues with any great eagerness. This last instance shows that it is the love of riches, the making them a treasure, the counting them a prize to be sought for, which in the teaching of Jesus is deprecated. The teaching of the great Apostle is in general accordance therewith, and only rarely can what he says be discounted on the ground that he was thinking of the speedy dissolution of all things. To speak in a word, Christianity does not regard the obtaining or the retaining of riches as the worthy object of a man's life. No critic, high or low, need hesitate to make that confession, or to add thereto that in the thought of Christ and his Apostles the possession of riches was regarded as a circumstance very likely to be hurtful to the moral and spiritual life.

IN reference to the decision of every Nonconformist place of worship in Bramley, Leeds, to place a room at the disposal of the coroner in which to hold inquests, instead of holding them in public-houses, a letter has been received by Mr. P. H. Pearson (secretary of the movement) from Mr. J. C. Malcolm (city coroner), stating that he will be glad to avail himself of the facilities thus offered him, and has given instructions with regard to the same to the Superintendent of the Police, in whose hands is the making of the necessary arrangements.

THE HOUSING PROBLEM.

IN dealing with the Housing Problem we are really dealing with two problems which intensify each other, but are more or less distinct in their causes and cures. There is first the question of insanitation, which may be much aggravated by overcrowding, but may also exist quite independently of it; and there is secondly the question of overcrowding itself.

Insanitation.

The remedy for insanitation is comparatively—only comparatively—simple, when not complicated by overcrowding. Strict administration of our sanitary legislation, without fear or favour, would go far to banish most of the existing evils; but strict administration can only be hoped for where we put it in the hands of impartial administrators, and where individual citizens will qualify themselves (and this is not difficult) to take an intelligent interest. The difficulties are intensified where the question of overcrowding comes in, and the closing of insanitary houses only means the removal of the tenants into places soon to become as bad.

Overcrowding.

It is overcrowding then which chiefly calls for attention, and none the less because opinion as to the proper policy to adopt in respect to it still remains in a state of chaos, while many of our past efforts at amelioration have only served to intensify it. Without attempting to offer any general solution I will try to sum up here the principal considerations affecting the question, and to indicate the policy which seems likely to succeed in the future.

Who Suffers from Overcrowding?

In the first place it is important to define as clearly as may be the class which is mainly affected by the difficulty. A careful inquiry made throughout London, district by district, has shown that this class consists almost entirely of (a) families containing more than two or three young children, and (b) families in irregular work or without a character. In both cases the difficulty is due to the reluctance of landlords in good streets to accept tenants who might offend against sanitary regulations, or who might fail to pay their rent, or be troublesome to other tenants; and the result is that they take refuge in less desirable streets where landlords are less scrupulous. One consequence of this crowding into less respectable streets is the anomalous fact that rents are higher than those in more respectable and sanitary streets, and that it would be actually cheaper for the working man with a family to live under better conditions. But he can only do so—if he remains in the town—by dispensing with the landlord and taking a house for himself; either a small house which he can occupy entirely, or a larger one, of which he must let off part to lodgers. This is one great argument against the destruction of small houses in towns, for in taking lodgers there is always a risk involved which the working man can ill afford to meet.

The Policy of Concentration.

It is clear that no remedy can be satisfactory which does not fully consider the needs of these classes, and this is just what our remedies in the past have not done. Our first impulse upon finding overcrowded and insanitary dwellings has been to pull them down and forthwith to replace them by much larger and better buildings, but however beneficial this may have been at first, it has lately proved no remedy at all. I may illustrate what I mean by the action of the London County Council and other bodies.

Under the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890, public authorities have large powers with respect to the demolition and rebuilding of houses. To summarise briefly: they can buy up insanitary areas, demolish the property and rebuild; or they can condemn particular houses and force the owners either to demolish them or put them in proper condition; or, finally, they can build additional houses without having previously dealt with insanitary property at all. Now until quite recently it has always been considered essential that when any houses were destroyed, equivalent accommodation should be provided in the immediate neighbourhood, so that the inhabitants dislodged should be rehoused in practically the same place, with the result that the worst streets in London are now replaced by towering blocks of "models," built on the most improved principles.

Disadvantages of "Models."

From the outside the problem seems solved; really it has been made one degree worse. It is true that hundreds of families are now housed where tens were before, each with its proper allowance of cubic feet; but upon inquiry it is found—and I have never seen this questioned—that the previous inhabitants of the area very rarely move into the new dwellings provided for them. All that is achieved is to attract a new set of people of a class which seldom has any real difficulty in getting accommodation. Speaking generally, it is fair to say that the erection of model dwellings, in which children are looked on with disfavour, and tenants must be respectable and in regular work, has had much to do with the pressure upon other quarters.

Overcrowding on the Area.

It is good, of course, that insanitary houses should go; but it would be far better to keep the site as an open space than to attract new dwellers into densely populated areas. Moreover, experience is beginning to teach us, often by the voice of the doctors, that overcrowding on the area may be almost as injurious to health as overcrowding in the house. It is no solution of the problem, that is, to pack the people layer over layer, while those above have to toil up and down weary stairs every time they go out, and those below are deprived of light and air. Fortunately the London County Council has begun to amend its ways, and is turning its attention—rather late in the day—to building small houses at a distance from crowded areas. Whether by building at all it does not do more harm than good by checking private enterprise is a further question.

Decentralisation.

They are accepting, in fact, a new policy—that of decentralisation. It is coming to be recognised that the idea of rebuilding our towns so as to mass more and more people on a given area is a mistaken one; that there comes a point beyond which we must not encourage—must not, indeed, allow—more people to inhabit a given district. Public authorities are now permitted to rehouse at a distance, if necessary outside the town altogether, and many of them are availing themselves of the permission. It is true that the people who leave the town may not be the actual people dispossessed, but whoever goes, the pressure is diminished instead of being increased.

From every point of view decentralisation is to be desired, but especially from the point of view of those principally affected by the overcrowding difficulty. Everyone knows how undesirable town life is for little children; everyone knows how the evils of "bad characters" are intensified when they are herded together in particular districts. The question is, How can this decentralisation be carried out most effectively and with least friction. Let us look at the forces already at work for and against the process, and that will help us to see where to apply any help which we can render.

Forces Against Decentralisation.

First amongst the forces which tell against decentralisation, which tell therefore for the massing of the people in towns, we must put the large extent to which our industries are carried on in the towns. To some this is essential; to many others it matters little whether they are in town or country; while there are some again—such as fruit-preserving—which would be actually more easily carried on in the country. Many of these go to the towns because of the supply of cheap labour which they can get there without being at the expense of providing houses; so that to a large extent our policy of trying to house the wage-earners at low rents in the towns has merely enabled the employers of cheap labour to carry on their business at the least possible trouble and expense to themselves. Employers go to town because they can find workers there more easily than in the country; workers go to town because they can find work and house room more easily than in the country.

Rural Housing.

This brings us to the second main obstacle to decentralisation, and that is the frequently inadequate and insanitary condition of rural housing. By concentrating our attention upon the towns, we have not only made matters in some ways more difficult there, but have allowed evils almost as serious to pass unchecked in the country. It is to be feared that these evils are often due to the neglect, or even selfishness, of landowners, who make it impossible to get a bit of land to build cottages on because they want to keep up the character of the property, or object to having poor people about. But it is to the country which we must mainly look for a solution of our overcrowding problems. In the towns the solution is fast becoming a physical impossibility; in the country the difficulty is only moral.

Finally, it is, of course, true that the excitement of town life is a great attraction to some; and any systematic attempt at decentralisation will have to take this into account, and emphasise counter-attractions in the country.

Forces in favour of Decentralisation.

If we turn now to the forces working for decentralisation, we shall find them very considerable and increasing. High rent in the towns, where land is urgently needed for business purposes, is probably the most potent. It has long ago practically banished dwelling-houses from the City of London; and if we, in our foolish wisdom, did not so persistently endeavour to counteract it, most of our congested areas might gradually be cleared out. Our endeavour to keep rents low in the towns is like putting water on the thermometer when the room is hot, instead of opening the window.

Bicycles and other improved methods of locomotion facilitate what high rent enforces, and enable the workers to have their homes and families at a distance from their place of work. But this is not altogether satisfactory. For many people it is a serious matter to add two journeys to the work of the day; and the final solution will be one in which many of the industries themselves will be removed from the towns, and will group their workers round them in healthy surroundings.

Exodus.

This is no fancy picture. The movement out has been going on for some years, and yearly gathers in force. High rates have already driven out many manufacturers—printers, cabinet makers, engineers, &c.; many others are waiting only until their leases fall in to go also. Unfortunately there is a counter tendency—though nothing like so widespread—for low-class employers to move in and make their profits by underpaying their workers. It is well worth considering whether some adjustment of the rates might not make them also find their profit in the country.

The movement has begun naturally and spontaneously on the part of the employers, and should be encouraged, perhaps even pressed on, by public authorities. Some interesting suggestions were made to the recent Committee of the House of Lords on the Housing of the Working Classes (Report 325) by the representative of the Home Office, who thought that railway companies and others desirous of acquiring land in towns should be induced to co-operate with employers in removing their factories and workers into the country. He stated that in London there are 748 large factories, employing 200,000 workers (representing a population of 600,000), many of which might thus be removed if there were sufficient motive given.

"Garden Cities."

Amongst other indications of the movement we may note the Garden City Association, which aims at making it systematic and carefully organised. The change of policy really means a great opportunity for providing healthy conditions of life for the workers, but it is an opportunity which may be easily let slip and lost for ever. Some well-known firms have with signal success planned out settlements in the country, and formed colonies living in the most favourable surroundings. But not all employers are wise or considerate, and I have heard of one wealthy firm which has recently built a large settlement of houses without a scrap of garden or open space in the whole of it. Others, again, merely move to country towns and leave their workers to crowd in where they may until the town extends itself to meet their needs. What this new association aims at is to plan cities of workers and employers to combine the advantages of town and country, "wherein shall be found the maximum attainable of comfort and convenience to the inhabitants." The plan has been carefully thought out, and has received influential support; and a pioneer company has been formed preparatory to the acquirement of an estate. Success would seem to depend ultimately upon the co-operation of manufacturers; for it is clear that the movement of employers and workers to the new cities must be simultaneous.

LITERATURE.

THE LIFE OF DR. MARTINEAU.*

SECOND NOTICE.

The interest of these volumes is so manifold, that it is not easy to select special points for notice. Next week we shall turn to Mr. Upton's study of Dr. Martineau's Philosophical Work, but first we must linger a little longer over the Biography, to indicate the lines of that religious development in which Dr. Martineau's influence and teaching had so remarkable a share during the past century, in the history of the churches into whose fellowship he was born, and to which he remained loyal to the end.

Writing to Professor William Knight in 1895, in reply to congratulations on his ninetieth birthday, Dr. Martineau thus referred to the character of his life-long teaching:—

It would indeed be pleasant could I, on looking back over my long years of opportunity, appropriate, even in small measure, your far too appreciative estimate. Rather must I side with the critics who tell me that, instead of guiding others, I have always been disturbing them. The mere record of my own personal changes of theological conviction, and the withdrawal by myself of certain early publications from reproduction, seems to make good the charge of instability. The only answer I can make itself includes an acknowledgment of the impeachment—namely, that what has been relinquished is historical tradition which partially crumbles away under the skilled search for its foundation; while what has been retained is the living and present relation witnessed by consciousness itself, between the human spirit and the Divine, and when once known there, re-found and recognised in its perfection under the unique personality of "Christ, our Head." The substitution, in short, of Religion at first-hand, straight out of the immediate interaction between the Soul and God, for Religion at second-hand, fetched, by copying, out of anonymous traditions of the Eastern Mediterranean eighteen centuries ago, has been the really directing, though hardly conscious, aim of my responsible years of life. So far as it is one-sided, it will doubtless be corrected and supplemented by teachers of wider and deeper vision. I thank God if it has been intrusted with any function serviceable for the needs of its day.

The changes that had come over the aspect of religion during his long career he had already described in that remarkable address on "Loss and Gain in Recent Theology," delivered to his old students in 1881; and indeed much earlier in the Farewell Sermon preached in Paradise-street Chapel in 1848, he told his congregation how it had been his constant aim "to substitute among you the Religion of Consciousness for the Religion of Custom," and "to elicit the moral beauty, the inherent sublimity, and the natural authority of Christianity."

In the fervour of his first enthusiasm when at Derby, in 1822, he determined to dedicate his life to the ministry of religion, as he recalled long afterwards, the voices in the pulpits at that time appeared to him "too sober and too cold," and he thought "there ought to be some stronger and more spiritual ministry, that should less depend upon our self-help, but should take us off our feet, and fling us into a diviner life than that which prevailed among us." By the side of that reminiscence Dr. Drummond places the following sentence from the address on "Loss and Gain":—

Who can ever forget the intense and lofty years when first the real communion of the Living God—the same God that received the cries of Gethsemane and Calvary—and the Sanctity of the inward Law, and the sublime contents of life on both sides of death, broke in a flood of glory upon his mind, and spread the world before him, stripped of his surface-illusions and with its diviner essence cleared?

Such was the spirit in which Martineau began his teaching, and continued to the end. It brought him, when he came to Liverpool in 1832, into closest sympathy with his friends John James Tayler and John Hamilton Thom; and these three, brothers in the ministry, who gratefully acknowledged their kinship and indebtedness to Channing, became the prophets of a new birth of spiritual religion in the Churches which they served, a new birth which was indeed prophetic of greater changes, which we have since witnessed in the much wider field of the religious life of England as a whole.

We noted last week the distrust with which the new teaching with its appeal to the inward witness of the spirit was received by many of the older Unitarians. The story is fully told by Dr. Drummond, especially at the point of acute crisis, when in 1857 it was decided to place the teaching of Manchester New College in the hands of the two heresiarchs alone, Tayler and Martineau. From this and from earlier years there are, in particular, letters of the deepest interest, showing how Martineau regarded the controversy and how clearly he grasped the issue in its wider bearings.

Thus in 1844 he wrote to Orville Dewey in America:—

Since I last wrote, Thom and I have joined together, and with J. J. Tayler and Charles Wicksteed, in the editorship of the Christian Teacher, whose name, by the way, we shall shortly change. It is time, we think, that the movement party in our body, distinguished by Spiritualism in Philosophy and a preference for an internal and "experimental" over an external and merely authoritative Christianity, should be adequately and avowedly represented; and the revived and dogged allegiance of our other Periodicals to the system of Priestley and Belsham has determined us to give voice to modes of thought which we deem truer and nobler, and which we know to have a wide though silent extension among us.

* "The Life and Letters of James Martineau." By James Drummond, M.A., LL.D., Litt.D., Principal of Manchester College, Oxford; and C. B. Upton, B.A., B.Sc., Professor of Philosophy in Manchester College, Oxford. In two volumes. London: James Nisbet and Co. 30s. net.

And two years later he told his friend how, while he believes in as much miracle as ever, he now discerns the supernatural element "more and more in Christ, less and less around him; not diminishing the amount, but shifting the position from his outward life to his inward mind." Eleven years later came the final contest, and when it was decided that he should go up to London to join Mr. Tayler at the College, Martineau wrote to an American friend:—

The delivery of the College into our hands makes a theological crisis in our body; and though carried by an overwhelming majority, containing the chief elements of our future—our youth, our culture, and even our wealth—is disliked and resisted by a highly conscientious and respectable minority, attached to the elder Unitarianism, and suffering from Germanophobia. With a little patience and tenderness towards honest scruples and mistrusts, the air will soon clear again; perhaps to be brighter than before.

That prediction was fulfilled, but at the time the tension of feeling was very great, and if the result had been different, it might have led to Martineau's removal to America. That it appeared so to him is clear from the following passage from another letter in that year of crisis:—

Should the new arrangement be powerfully confirmed, it will fix me henceforth in London to very congenial work. Should the arrangement be disapproved, the decision will amount to a vote of expulsion on the score of heresy from our religious connexion in England; and, in that case, I know not whether I may not appear as a suppliant for asylum in the New World. The crisis is in reality much more serious than could be gathered from any public symptom; for our English reticence keeps back a great deal. The old Unitarianism is already struck with inevitable and visible death; and the question simply is, whether it will take up or whether it will throw off the young life intellectual and spiritual which is ready, if permitted, to accept its consecration from the elders' hands and make no breach of succession, but which, if rejected and disallowed, will disperse itself for action among other churches, where Faith and Love are strong and Thought itself more truly catholic.

Happily the sentence of expulsion was not pronounced, and the old controversy died away, while to the churches it became their chief honour that Martineau belonged to their fellowship, and was gratefully acknowledged as the inspirer of their best life. On this point Mr. Thom's testimony at a college meeting in 1885 is worth recalling:—"There are now no two parties amongst us. There are no two sections, looking jealously, suspiciously, and distrustfully at one another—and I think Manchester New College has reason to be proud that mainly owing to the influence of its two latest Principals, of John James Tayler, and his congenial successor, Dr. Martineau, our Church, in all essential matters, is now a Church of the Spirit."

In concluding this notice we will turn for a moment to a different subject, one among many over which we would gladly linger. There are in these volumes many letters of wise counsel and encouragement, in others we are admitted to the inmost shrine of grief and of Divine consolation. From two of these we cannot forbear quotation. The first was written in 1868, during Dr. Martineau's London ministry, to one on whom a heavy cross of suffering had been laid. The reason for such suffering, he says, we cannot know, but find our peace in utter submission and love; and then the letter continues:—

Alas! dear friend, that the lot of sacrifice should have fallen to you! But what should we be without the biographies of noble suffering? Is there anything so purifying in its search of us—that sinks the self so low and lifts the soul so high—as the sight of pain and grief divinely borne? I declare to you, the instances I have seen or known of such lives—including yours—haunt me as a perpetual presence, and mingle tender and sacred undertones with the superficial voices of daily duty and of natural joy. That the chords which give forth such music for humanity should thrill with anguish in the striking is indeed a pathetic necessity; but the very pity of it, burning down into the heart of us, comes in contact with all the love and reverence we have, and kindles them into an enveloping passion. The really perplexing cases are those in which suffering seems to spread in circles of moral deterioration in the mind of patient and of observers; not those in which it deepens, refines, and strengthens, and like the lightning, while it blasts a single tree, quickens the whole forest into green. I cannot but have faith that your children, however sadly bereft of your personal care, will be educated by your image and memory to a form and stature of character which no days of happy care could give. But this is a thought which comes too near to finding reasons; and I dare not pretend to them; but rest simply here—that if only we can give ourselves up in trust, and the more we are stricken by the hand, fly the more closely for refuge to the heart, of the all-loving God, there is no pain or terror which will not work itself clear out of the cloud into higher glory.—(Vol. I., p. 448.)

That was written in 1868, when the invalid had been already for seven years a prisoner of hope. Nearly twenty years later, in October, 1887, there is another letter, which (although no names are given) we can hardly be wrong in associating with the same family. Now the mother's long trial is at an end, and Dr. Martineau writes to a daughter, who also had been ill, and had been obliged to be away from home, of the new sorrow, in which he also shares—"or, shall I say, a solemn and pathetic parting that must not be a sorrow?"

A shrinking of natural reverence oppresses me, in living intercourse, with a reserve which it is the privilege of death to remove; and now that we are severed by the interval of worlds, I may say that your mother has for many years been one of the sanctities of life and thought to me. Whilst her outward lot half tempted one to look on this scene of things as simply cruel, her inward spirit so transfigured it as to demonstrate it divine. The latter years of personal and family affliction naturally leave the strongest impression upon the memory of her friends. But her younger days of unbroken vigour are still fresh in my remembrance; when, in common with her sisters, she was conspicuous for a rare combination of eager intellect, in constant prayer for light, and deep affections, aspiring to all that is good, and devout humility, ready always to look up and trust. And though her term of allotted years seemed to be broken in two and half disabled, yet, after all, she had time enough for all the grand functions of a human soul—to think, to act, to suffer—and be purified by conquest in them all. We may well be thankful that the deliverance is come, and the welcome given into a more fitting and sacred society than ours. And if to any of her children should be assigned some partial touch of an experience like hers, they know whither to turn for their supporting saint—or, rather, the guardian "angel who always beholds the face of the Father in heaven."—(Vol. II., p. 234.)

ENGLISH UTILITARIANISM.*

THE history of English Ethics is a strangely neglected subject. We have had indeed, for many years, Professor Bain's careful summaries of particular books by English moral philosophers (to be found at the end of his volume on "Mental and Moral Science"); and the late Professor Sidgwick's "Outlines of the History of Ethics for English Readers" gives, with perfect accuracy and impartiality, all that an "outline" of the work of English writers could possibly give. There are also a few valuable monographs on particular writers, such as the interesting volumes on Francis Hutcheson, by Dr. W. R. Scott, of St. Andrews University. Dr. Martineau's aim in the second volume of his "Types" is criticism in the light of his own ethical theory, rather than history. Hence Dr. Albee truly says that we have no adequate history of English Ethics. He has attempted to cover a part of the ground by tracing the rise and growth of Utilitarianism in England, taking this mode of thought as England's most characteristic contribution to the development of ethical theory. The writers dealt with are: Richard Cumberland; Shaftesbury and Hutcheson (their relation to Utilitarianism); Berkeley, John Gay, and John Brown; Hume; Hartley; Abraham Tucker; Paley and Bentham; Mill, Spencer, Sidgwick. The author certainly cannot be accused of treating the subject either carelessly or in a partisan spirit.

When one speaks of English Utilitarianism [says Dr. Albee], it is not wholly evident, without explanation, whether one mainly refers to a very important practical movement of English thought, extending through the closing years of the eighteenth century and about the first half of the nineteenth century; or to a very familiar (to us probably the most familiar) type of abstract ethical theory.

By this distinction he points out the difference between his own work and Sir Leslie Stephen's three volumes on "The English Utilitarians." Sir Leslie Stephen deals with Bentham, James Mill, and J. S. Mill as exponents of a great national movement, showing its relation to contemporary movements in other spheres of thought. Dr. Albee is concerned "with the development of an abstract type of ethical theory." In our opinion the author makes too complete a separation between these two ways of treating the subject. Sir Leslie Stephen's point of view is historically the correct one. The social and political side of the Utilitarian movement was not—as Dr. Albee seems to say—a set of corollaries, which were supposed to result from the theory; rather, the theory was an abstract statement of what was involved in the movement. The Theological Utilitarians (such as Paley) taught that actions were right or wrong because they made for or against "the greatest happiness [i.e., pleasure] of the greatest number," including rewards and punishments in a future life; and this doctrine was simply the theoretical expression of an unspiritual, low, and narrow outlook on life. The Political Utilitarians (such as

* "A History of English Utilitarianism." By Ernest Albee, Ph.D., Instructor in the Sage School of Philosophy, Cornell University. London: Sonnenschein and Co., 1902. Price 10s. 6d.

Bentham) adopted "happiness" as the standard of right and wrong, because this was (at that time) the only possible expression, in ethical theory, of a set of practical convictions of a "radical" and democratic character, e.g., that actions are to be judged by their tangible results, that "everybody is to count for one and nobody for more than one," and so forth. Dr. Albee's account of the Utilitarian writers is interesting and instructive; but we think it would have been more so if he had recognised that the strength of Utilitarianism lay—as the very name indicates—not in its abstract theory but in its practical basis. The logical theory of Utilitarianism has been riddled by unanswerable criticisms, and is its least interesting and least significant side. Through limiting his attention to this side of it, Dr. Albee has been led to exaggerate the importance of two or three writers, such as John Gay and John Brown; but he has written a really interesting and instructive book, which will be of value to students of ethics. ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

THIS month's Contemporary opens with a frank and manly article by General Botha, telling of the feelings and motives with which he and his comrades came to this country, and made their appeal here and to the nations of the civilised world, for their distressed and desolate country. "If the bulk of Englishmen," he says, "only realised the pitiable state of our men, women, and children, we should have no need to put our appeal in words."

It was when weighed down by that load of grief and care that we reached the shores of England, and it may well be that the most friendly attitude which we were then humanly able to assume seemed to many people in this country less demonstratively cordial than the warm welcome which we received warranted them in anticipating. But is it reasonable to explain that natural attitude by any other than the obvious facts intelligible to all? A man whose father, sons, or brethren have been killed in a quarrel may agree to forgive the slayer, to live with him in peace, to become his fellow-worker in a good cause, to hope and endeavour to become his friend; but can he be expected to do more than that before the first blades of grass have sprung up on the graves of those near and dear to him? No man worthy of the name, coming as we came from the ruined home of his people, of his people who had lost their worldly goods, their kith and kin, and the independence which they set above either, could have accomplished in that respect more than we did. If he feigned more, he would be a hypocrite; if he effected more, he would be an angel.

General Botha pleads not only for generous help for his country, but for trust of his people as a far surer pledge of peace and future prosperity than any army of occupation.

Dr. Robertson Nicoll writes on "The Education Bill and the Free Churches," arguing that the present claims of the Church of England for dominance in the schools are identical with those of the Roman Catholics, and entirely contrary to the spirit which ruled in the Church in 1870. He adds a timely reminder of the origin of the Cowper-Temple Clause, the author of which was a staunch Churchman and leader of his party. Nonconformists, Dr. Nicoll declares, cannot submit to the fresh endowment of Sectarianism now proposed, nor will the fairness of the English people, even if the Bill should now be forced through Parliament, long allow it to remain. Readers who have been attracted by the recent movements of Theosophy and "Christian Science" will find some interesting exposition and comment in Mr. E. Wake Cook's article on "The Newer Dispensation." The growing insight into the things of the spirit claimed by these movements demand, in his view, serious consideration. Mr. Stephen Paget, replying to Mr. Stephen Coleridge's letter of last month on the Registrar-General's returns, writes in a temper which inevitably makes one suspicious of the soundness of his case. An unsigned article on "The White Slave Trade" gives a hopeful account of what is being done by the co-operation of European nations to make an end of a cruel and infamous trade.

In the Fortnightly a "Dissident Liberal," in an article on "The Reversion to Toryism," deals chiefly with the Education Bill, and sums up his objections to it in the following terms:—

(1) Both in respect of primary and of higher education it offers the minimum of progress—the accepted Conservative method of preventing the maximum or at least the adequate measure of progress, which is now likely to be longer postponed than if no Education Bill at all had been introduced in the present Session.

(2) The Bill gives a preferential position of authority and influence to the Anglican and Catholic clergy in one of the most extensive and important spheres of public administration. It unquestionably amounts, therefore, to an indirect but perfectly effective form of sectarian endowment.

(3) It places in the hands of private persons the appointment of those who are to be paid by the community.

(4) It throws open employment in all the public elementary schools to Anglican and Catholic teachers, but excludes Nonconformists from employment in at least half those schools.

(5) By suppressing School Boards and School Board elections, and confounding the essentially national matter of education with the whole multifarious routine of merely municipal affairs, the Bill establishes the single authority, in the form most calculated to increase the public indifference to education which is already the greatest of all the disadvantages under which education labours.

(6) While the Bill provides for equal expenditure upon Voluntary schools in respect of secular education, it does not guarantee an equal standard of efficient teaching.

In the same number will be found an article on "Philip James Bailey" and his Festus, by Mr. Edmund Gosse.

In the Nineteenth Century and After Sir Harry H. Johnston writes with knowledge on "The Native Labour Question in South Africa," looking to the country north of the Zambesi for an adequate supply, and noting the conditions essential to a humane treatment of the natives, Mr. G. R. S. Mead contributes "Some Notes on the Gnostics," showing that there is more to be said for them than would be allowed by their orthodox opponents in the early days of the Church. Sir Wemyss Reid, in his review of "Last Month," marks as a blot on the Education Bill not only its unfair Sectarianism, but the serious injury done to education by the threatened extinction of the great School Boards.

The Monthly Review has a fourth illustrated article on "The Painters of Japan," and an article by Dr. Emil Reich on the "Cambridge Modern History," of which he speaks as "the first serious attempt, in English, at a scientific general history of modern times," adding a word of praise of the late Lord Acton, the scholar to whom the idea and plan of the history was due.

In the National Review there is printed the inaugural address given by "Alfred Austin (Poet Laureate)" at the recent opening of the winter session of the Edinburgh Philosophical Institution. The address was on "What is Philosophy?" and the answer apparently was, "Something not half as good as poetry"—though the Laureate did not say, "as my poetry." We quote the eloquent conclusion of the address:—

Philosophies are passing. Great Poems are permanent. The Iliad and the Odyssey are as fresh to-day as they were when the frailty of Helen prepared the fate of Troy, and Ulysses, returning at last to Ithaca, was recognised by his old nurse, and slew the suitors of Penelope. Therefore, read fewer novels; pore for briefer time over newspapers; dwell longer and more intimately with the Poets, the greater Poets. They are the Wise Men. They are the Philosophers, the true lovers and inculcators of wisdom. Great Poetry is the surest antidote to the prevailing virus of Materialism, the enduring mouthpiece of the spiritual and the elevating. Not idly did Greek imagination, so profound and instructive in its symbolism, represent Apollo, the Sun God, as the God of Poesy as well. For Great Poetry transfigures the material and prosaic into the spiritual and romantic world. Great poetry is produced and animated by the union of the Head with the Heart, of Reason with Emotion, that most complete, most hallowed, and most fruitful of all earthly nuptials.

OBITUARY.

MR. FRANK HARLAND.

BY the death, at the age of fifty-seven, of Mr. Frank Harland, which occurred on the first day of this month at the house of his son-in-law, near Birmingham, a familiar figure in Manchester Unitarian circles has been removed. Mr. Harland was the second son of the late John Harland, F.S.A., sometime editor of the Manchester Guardian; he received a part of his education at the school kept by the late Rev. T. E. Poynting at Montongreen, and on leaving school entered the service of the Manchester and Salford Bank, in which he remained till his retirement, in the present year, through failing health. In 1869 he married Alice Nodal, a member of a well-known Manchester family connected with the Society of Friends. Always living in or near Manchester, Mr. Harland was associated at one time or another with the congregations at Gorton, Platt, and Upper Brook-street. When the Manchester District Association began a forward movement in 1893, Mr. Harland, then living at Heaton Mersey, threw himself heartily into the work at the Heaton Moor centre, subsequently becoming secretary of the congregation formed there. He frequently gave valuable help by taking the service for young people held on Sunday mornings, and occasionally preached at the ordinary service. He was one of the secretaries for the great bazaar held in the St. James's Hall, in 1897, to raise funds for the purposes of the Forward Movement—a post involving a great deal of work and time, both cheerfully given. On removing into Manchester again in 1899, he attached himself, with his family, to the Upper Brook-street Chapel, and also gave assistance to the Rev. Sydney Street, at the Renshaw-street Mission, in connection with the Boys' Brigade and the Savings Bank. So recently as last year he held the post of treasurer in connection with the bazaar held in the Chorlton Town Hall for the Upper Brook-street congregation. At the interment in the churchyard of St. John's, Heaton Mersey, on Thursday, the service was taken by the Rev. Charles Peach.

MR. J. A. BINNS.

MR. JOSEPH ARTHUR BINNS, the Official Receiver in Bankruptcy for the Bradford District, whose death occurred at his residence, Oak-lane, Manningham, on the morning of Oct. 29, was the elder brother of the late Rev. William Binns. Born in 1826, at Bingley, he was educated at the village school, and, like his brother, was in early life a Methodist local preacher, but then became a Unitarian. He entered a solicitor's office, and for many years was prominent in the management of the Third Equitable Building Society. It was in 1883 that he was appointed to the Receivership in Bankruptcy.

Mr. Binns was for many years an active Liberal politician, and for four years was a member of the Bradford Town Council, being specially interested in the public libraries of the town. He served also as Chairman of the Library Committee of the Mechanics' Institute. He had himself a decided literary gift, and not only wrote verses, but contributed articles on such subjects as Chartism, Savings Banks, Trades Unions, Socialism, to "Chambers' Encyclopædia," and wrote for several magazines.

The funeral took place on Saturday at Undercliffe Cemetery.

"ASSOCIATION SUNDAY."

SIR,—Will you allow me the courtesy of your columns to make a personal appeal to ministers and congregations to do all they can to support the British and Foreign Unitarian Association by generous collections on Sunday week, Nov. 16? I hope there will be a widespread determination to back up the Association in the excellent service it is rendering our Unitarian faith and work at home and abroad. It helps to establish and maintain churches, holds conferences and meetings, publishes and circulates books and pamphlets, promotes sympathy and united action among liberal religious thinkers and workers.

The whole of the income derived from subscriptions and collections is expended in missionary grants. There is a constantly-widening field for the work of the Association, limited only by lack of more ample means.

Those of your readers who would like to help, but who cannot attend any place of worship on the day the collection is taken, can send their contributions to the ministers to be included in the amount, or direct to Essex Hall, as a subscription or donation.

OSWALD NETTLEFOLD, Treasurer.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

"And when the tempter came to him."

THIS summer I have been fortunate enough to visit a great many old and beautiful churches. Somewhere, in all of them, we were sure to find a picture of a very hideous creature, partly man and partly beast. He had horns to gore, he had huge jaws to crush, his tail ended in a dart to wound and tear. Altogether he was a frightful monster enough, a monster that you and I would certainly run away from.

You will guess, without my telling you, that this picture was meant to represent the devil. Pictures of this kind have been taken by multitudes of people to represent an actual being. A young girl who had been used to see such pictures in her religious books asked me the other day, "Do you believe there really is a devil?" and she went on to tell me how frightened she used to be by them. I was very glad to be able to say, "No; I don't believe in any such devil as you are thinking of."

But the artist, you know, doesn't always mean to represent by his picture an actual being. Perhaps you have sometimes seen Spring painted. The painter shows us a lovely girl flying through the air, with her robe full of flowers, which she is scattering over the earth. You would understand that he meant to show us the freshness and the beauty and the gladness of spring in this charming way, but you wouldn't think he meant to say that Spring was really a young woman. Spring is that wonderful change that comes over the earth when the buds burst forth on the trees, and the flowers push out of the ground, and the birds build their nests; when a new radiance and joy fill the air and the heart.

Perhaps the artist wants to paint Night, and he shows us a woman with sleeping children pressed in her arms floating across a dim and starlit sky above a dim, dark world. You would know that he did not mean that Night was an actual woman, but that he meant to tell us of the quiet, and the peace, and the veil drawn over the cares and labours of the day, and the children borne into the land of dreams.

So in these pictures the artist didn't, perhaps, mean us to understand that he was painting an actual creature, but he meant to tell us the real character of all that is evil and wrong, and that if we could see it as it really is, it would look hateful, ugly, monstrous; we should find it always bring harm and punishment. He wanted us to be frightened by it; he wanted us to think of it as something hideous, inhuman, terrible.

And that meaning is true. All things evil have just this nature, and all that tempts us to them. No artist could paint them worse than they are.

But there is this danger in painting the devil so black—people don't know him when they meet him, and that is a pity. They have been frightened at the picture, and they have expected evil in real life would look just as frightful. And it didn't. Then they have said: "Oh, this isn't what we were to be afraid of. There isn't anything dreadful here. This isn't what they warned us against."

Among the first stories in the Old Testament is one of the Temptation, a story of two people persuaded to do wrong, by showing them how pleasant it was and how much they would gain by it. And, strangely enough, at the beginning of the New Testament is the story of another temptation. When the tempter came to Jesus it was not to propose anything that looked very wrong, anything to alarm him. No, it was to suggest that he should turn stones into bread, not into poison. It sounded like a useful proposal, and, seeing how many hungry people there were in the world, a kind one. What harm could there be in turning stones into bread?

So when the tempter comes to us, or perhaps I had better say when the temptation comes, it never comes as "This is something wrong," but always as "This is something pleasant, something I want so much." We are not frightened by it. It seems nice. It doesn't look a bit like the horrid creature on the church windows. We don't know it, so different is it from what we expected.

The trick we played on another boy—it didn't look like pain to him. It looked like fun. When we stole away with the last boys' paper, and forgot the errand we promised to do, or the preparation for school, it didn't look like anything so ugly as selfishness; it was just being so interested we couldn't help it. When we snatched at some pleasure, without thinking of the disappointment to brother or sister, it wasn't that we meant to hurt them; it was only that we wanted our own gratification so much.

Well, this is what I thought as I looked at the evil creature figured on the stained glass. If the tempter always looked like that he wouldn't be dangerous; we should know him, and fly from him. If cheating always looked like cheating, and lying like lying, and stealing like stealing, and cruelty like cruelty—oh, who would be a liar, or a thief, or a cheat or cruel? But temptation always turns the other side out. It comes smiling and persuading, and is careful not to wake up our conscience, not to frighten us.

Milton, in his poem "Paradise Lost," represents Satan, the leader of the revolt in heaven, now outcast on earth, whispering his persuasions to sleeping Eve in the guise of a harmless toad; and the mighty angel Ithuriel is sent from heaven to warn of danger. Ithuriel touches Satan with his spear, and straightway Satan springs up in his own shape—

> For no falsehood can endure
> Touch of celestial temper, but returns
> Of force to its own likeness.

You have heard of "Ithuriel's spear." Only this morning I saw in the paper that a picture of Ithuriel with his spear was on exhibition in London.

Well, Ithuriel's spear for us is just the power of the pure heart, of the loving nature to seize instantly by a kind of instinct the true character of what looks so plausible and tempting, to know it for what it is, just as Jesus knew.

And then we are not to excuse it, or linger over it, not to try to persuade ourselves that wrong is right, or at least that wrong is pleasant, or useful or necessary; not even to do, as I spoke of doing just now—run away from it—but bravely fight against it.

"Resist the Devil, and he will flee from you."

OUR ISM OR THE TRUTH?

THIS question is suggested to us by a notice of the first number of the Hibbert Journal by Dr. ROBERTSON NICOLL, which appeared in the British Weekly of Oct. 9. The notice began with a word of cordial appreciation :— "This is one of the best first numbers we have ever seen. It does not depend on one or two interesting articles, but is interesting throughout." The object of the Editors of the Hibbert Journal, our readers will remember, is "to offer to religious thought a genuinely open field." But Dr. NICOLL is hardly to be persuaded that any such attempt can succeed in divesting itself altogether of bias, for he says :—

> The general position of the Review is indicated by the fact that it is published by the Hibbert Trustees, and edited by two Unitarian ministers—Mr. Jacks and Dr. Hicks. There is a committee with representatives of orthodox Churches, but the general preponderance of a certain school in unmistakable.

And after noticing some of the contents of the number, Dr. NICOLL returns to his point, and presses home what we can only take to be an argument against the single-minded pursuit of truth, by suggesting that if it should lead to a general adoption of Unitarianism, the result would be disastrous.

The Editors express their readiness to offer an open field to every form of religious thought, except perhaps such as are dead, "and have lost the power to outgrow their own limitations." As to what may be dead, Dr. NICOLL is doubtful, but there would seem in his view to be something worse even than a dead form of religious thought. We quote the conclusion of his notice :—

> It will be seen, however, from what we have said that a particular school of theological thought is very ably represented here, and that some space is found for other schools. But it is impossible not to think of the results of these views on the Churches that have more or less accepted them. Unitarianism has much in it that commands respect, but what is the state of the Unitarian churches? Can anyone doubt that if the predominant phase of thought in this view were to prevail it would lay waste the whole organisation of Christianity in this country? There may be dead forms of faith; it is a question. There are without doubt killing forms of faith, forms of faith that slay the Christian consciousness and the Christian energy.

"The predominant phase of thought in this view" should perhaps have been "in this Review"; but in any case, are we drawing an unfair inference from this passage when we say that Dr. NICOLL is distrustful of the open pursuit of truth, and wishes to retain a dogmatic reservation on behalf of what he regards as essential to the "Christian consciousness?" In the Hibbert Journal an open field is offered to every form of living evangelical faith, no less than to others, for the reasoned exposition of what each writer may regard as vital truth, but because the Editors are "Unitarian" ministers, Dr. NICOLL thinks that a preponderant influence is bound to be given to a certain school of thought, and hence the warning note of his conclusion.

What is that school of thought? Undismayed by the cry of Unitarian! we say it is the school which believes in the freedom of human thought, and its capacity to attain to Divine truth. It is an injurious suggestion that the Editors of the Hibbert Journal do not mean what they say in their opening address, and are not prepared to give an equal hearing to thinkers of every school. They have not established the Hibbert Journal for the advocacy of their own Unitarianism, but for the pursuit of truth. But Dr. NICOLL warns liberal thinkers, who are found in many Churches, to beware of that "school of thought" to which they belong. It has led many to Unitarianism, and look at the Unitarian churches! In them, Dr. NICOLL implies, "the Christian consciousness and the Christian energy" have been slain.

Of that we are not so sure. We are not about to boast of those churches in which Unitarianism is the prevailing doctrine, and which for generations have maintained the principle of freedom of thought in matters of religion. They appear to have little ecclesiastical genius, but they have quietly persisted for more than a hundred years in their distinctly Unitarian phase, and any talk of their extinction is altogether idle. It is perhaps their fault as much as their misfortune that their numbers have not more rapidly increased, but neither Christian consciousness nor Christian energy is dead in them. Their Christian energy does not take the form of an evangelical mission or the fervour of a revivalist meeting, but it has had its share in the more patient and silent redemptive work of the world, in the spirit of CHRIST'S self-sacrifice and brotherly love; and if their Christian consciousness is not such as Dr. NICOLL can recognise, we are content to abide in the fellowship of MARTINEAU'S "Endeavours after the Christian Life," and JOHN HAMILTON THOM'S "Laws of Life after the Mind of Christ." That what is lacking in our Church life is no necessary result of the "school of thought" to which we have given our whole-hearted allegiance is proved by the witness of those two men, and of many others both of the past and the present time.

Dr. NICOLL warns us that if our "school of thought" were to prevail, the whole organisation of Christianity would be laid waste. Certain things undoubtedly would be laid waste, and among them the dominance of the extreme sacerdotalist, and of the old evangelical scheme of salvation: on the other hand a living faith in GOD and in human brotherhood would remain, with loyal service of GOD'S kingdom of righteousness and truth, and in the midst would be the abiding inspiration of the true humanity of CHRIST.

It appears to us, therefore, that liberal thinkers may be undismayed, and that the Editors of the Hibbert Journal may pursue with good hope their service of the great cause of Truth. They have a faith which is worthier than Dr. NICOLL'S distrust, and it is a happy augury for the future of religion in England, that so many distinguished thinkers and scholars, belonging to very various Churches, are willing to come out into the open field, and in the frankest fellowship seek together to draw nearer to the Eternal Light.

I HEARD three men disputing half the night
If Roman, Greek, or Anglican be right.
When they arose, all hot, and each unmoved
By anything the others claimed as proved,
I said: "On yonder panel, from its nail,
Hangs my thermometer with three-fold scale.
Perhaps you'll kindly tell me which is right,
Celsius or Réaumur or Fahrenheit?"

THE critics appear to be agreed that Mrs. Humphry Ward's dramatic version of Eleanor, as presented at the Court Theatre, is not a success. Intensely interesting to anyone who cared for the story it could not fail to be, but as the scenes unfolded, the question more than once arose, "What will anyone who has not read the book make of it?" The Guardian's critic answers, as being one of those, "The tale did not tell itself." Eleanor and Lucy were both very well acted, and Manisty was as insufferable on the stage as he is in the book, but the real power of the story—the tragedy of Eleanor's life, her long and bitter struggle, and the victory of her final renunciation—is not such that it can be truly represented on the stage. It is an interior drama to be studied in a quiet that can linger over its profound meaning.

MEN OF CONVICTION.

UNDER the title "Dreaming Dreams and Seeing Visions," the November number of Sermons for the Day gives the morning sermon preached by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong in the Church of the Divine Unity, Newcastle-on-Tyne, in connection with the recent annual meeting of the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Christian Association. Of this very timely sermon we gave an account in our report of the autumnal meetings at Newcastle, but here we will take leave to reproduce its concluding passages.

"Let us pray for strenuous men who have convictions—vital, germinant principles seeding in their hearts, which bind life together in a self-consistent unity. And when folk have clear convictions, strong and penetrating, then will the old men dream dreams, and the young men see visions. Out of the convictions grow large and inspiring ideals for which men deem it worth while to toil, and strive, and serve, though it earn them not an ounce of gold, and a myriad tongues cry out in reprobation. They see in vision a world other than before their fleshly eye, a world in which society and institutions are shaped in accordance with the principles that move them, answer to the convictions that dominate their minds. And to make real that ideal world they are ready to live and die. And even though their convictions be mistaken, their souls are ennobled by that allegiance, purged and cleansed and chastened, and they become as sons of God walking among common men. The sphere of their ideal may be in Church, or State, or the relation of the soul to God, or the relations of man to man. Loyala saw in a vision a world of men all bound in the allegiance of an absolute obedience to the spiritual authority of Rome, and he created that marvellous Society of Jesuits which has played and still plays so mighty a part in the history of the Church. Luther dreamed a dream of a world of men all liberated from the hyprocrisy of Rome and saved by faith, and his wand created the great Protestant communities through whom Europe had been reborn. Wesley received the spirit of the Lord to conceive an England in which the weaver and the miner should know and serve the Christ, in sweetness and purity in life, and the vast Methodist connection sprang into being at his word. Cobden dreamed a dream of all the broad acres of the world pouring their corn into England to feed the hungering artisan and his wife and children, and the great protective system of finance broke down—as we had thought till last spring for ever—at his potent touch. Mazzini beheld in vision an Italy transformed from abject slavery to the liberty of a gifted and united nation, and Popes and Bourbons found the strength all oozing out of them as the people shook off their chains. Lincoln, being caught up of the Spirit, saw an America in which the great curse which lay at the heart of the Union should be lifted off, and the shackles fell away from the sable limbs, and from Maine to Florida was one nation of the free.

"All these were men of conviction, clear and self-consistent, and the ideal rose up as a vision in their hearts, and according to their conscience they wrought undaunted through the years, and they made the world other than it was.

"And so say I to all men and women of this twentieth century, which for good or ill must decide so many human issues vast in scale and momentous in effect: 'Shake from your eyes the drowsiness, lift up your hearts above their timid tremor, think out great and true convictions, wed yourselves to high and fruitful principles, and enter everyone into the service of some pure ideal which shall give unity, grace, yes, and the true patent of nobility to this life of yours on earth.' Would that once more the voice of God might ring forth across the world: 'I will pour out my spirit on all flesh; and your sons and your daughters shall prophesy, your old men shall dream dreams, your young men shall see visions!'"

MINISTERS' PENSION AND INSURANCE FUND.

AT a recent meeting of the Managers of this Fund nearly fifty applications by ministers were dealt with, and other applications, we hear, have since come in. A significant and welcome feature is the evident appreciation of the advantages offered by the Fund to ministers in or approaching middle age. The rules permit of extra assistance being given to applicants over forty who apply on or before Jan. 1, 1903; and it is clear that a considerable number of ministers have shrewdly noticed this, and have determined to make the effort necessary to secure the substantial benefits offered. We understand that there has been some very commendable hesitation on the part of ministers reluctant to crowd out by their applications, possibly, some brother ministers whose circumstances are more straitened; but such honourable scruples may be at once set aside as needless. The funds available appear to be quite adequate to meet the needs of all likely to apply for some time to come.

One point that has not been fully understood is that in all cases set forth in the tables A to G, issued to ministers with the rules of the Fund, the premiums cease at sixty-five. It is only by accident that this was not expressly stated with respect to tables C and D.

It is extremely desirable that our younger ministers should insure as early as possible, even at the cost of some self-denial. The premiums, they must observe, increase every year, and the benefits which may now be secured for a small annual payment will prove much more costly as time goes on. We may remind all interested that Mr. J. Cogan Conway, whose appeals in these columns began the movement that has been so successful, is the Hon. Sec. to the Fund, and inquiries addressed to him at Ringwood, Hants, will be duly attended to.

IF we had never before looked upon the earth, but suddenly came to it man or woman grown, set down in the midst of a summer mead, would it not seem to us a radiant vision? The hues, the shapes, the song and life of birds, above all the sunlight, the breath of heaven, resting on it; the mind would be filled with its glory, unable to grasp it, hardly believing that such things could be mere matter and no more. Like a dream of some spirit land it would appear, scarce fit to be touched lest it should fall to pieces, too beautiful to be long watched lest it should fade away.—Richard Jefferies.

THE MESSIANIC SECRET IN THE GOSPELS.*

IT is now generally conceded that Mark is the earliest gospel, and that in its present or an earlier form it lay before the first and third evangelists when they were constructing their narratives. Consequently it has risen considerably in estimation since Augustine described its author as the curtailer and footman of Matthew; and since Griesbach dismissed as fictions repugnant to the truth the statements of Papias which connect this gospel with the preaching of Peter.

And it is well known that Mark occupies a special position in regard to one of the fundamental questions in the life of Jesus—namely, his relation to the Christhood or Messiahship. At the outset of the gospel, Jesus is indeed declared by the voice from heaven to be the Son of God. But he passes forth into his ministry of teaching and healing, and the Messianic dignity bestowed (or ratified) at the baptism remains a closely guarded secret until the beginning of the end. The demoniacs, it is true, recognise him as Messiah, but they are strictly charged not to reveal their knowledge. The sick ones healed by the Messianic touch are with equal urgency prohibited from disclosing the miracle of their cure. But by word, at least, Jesus does not claim Messianic rank, nor do the disciples—even the Intimate Three—suspect in whose presence they stand till the scene in the neighbourhood of Caesarea Philippi. It seems plain that the confession of Peter here is intended to denote a crisis in the history. Jesus does not, indeed, accept the title by which Peter addresses him, and it is countered by one of the recurring prohibitions. Nevertheless, there is henceforth a change in the representation. The narrative of the Transfiguration follows as if to vindicate the accuracy of Peter's perception, and from this point Jesus utters prophecies of his forthcoming sufferings and death. The entry into Jerusalem is a Messianic entry: before the high priest Jesus confesses that he is Messiah; and the superscription on the cross is one that makes mock of the Messianic claim.

The other gospels, on the contrary, represent Jesus as Messiah publicly known as such from the beginning. In John, the Baptist proclaims him, and the disciples know that it is the Messiah they are called to follow. Both in Matthew and Luke the birth-stories are charged with Messianic signification, and though Matthew's account of the scene at Caesarea Philippi contains features which favour Mark's representation, yet both Matthew and Luke describe the ministry as Messianic; Matthew incorporating a Messianic claim in the Sermon on the Mount, Luke making Jesus begin his work with the application of a Messianic text of prophecy.

The divergences between the gospels on this question of the Messiahship are important, but the problem they present is not essentially different from others which arise from a comparison of the four records. The question, however, is not reduced to simplicity if we choose to accept the account of Mark as the earliest and most credible. For instance, are we to assume that Jesus was himself conscious of Messianic dignity throughout the whole of his ministry? If so, what explanation are we to offer of the earlier silence, the strict prohibitions? The answer is often given that he shrank from public appropriation of the Messiahship because the idea was vulgarised and nationalised: that there was danger of entanglement with the government or of popular tumult; in other words, that the motive of the secret was either timidity or discretion. The explanation does not give an adequate account of the publicity of the miracles, or of the public appearance as Messiah on the entry to Jerusalem unaccompanied by any elucidation of the real character of his claim. Or again the motive of the secrecy is discovered in a "pedagogic intention." He desired, it is said, to train the Twelve gradually into the true conception of his person, so that they might be freed from the materialism of the common conception and prepared to preach the suffering Messiah when the proper time should come. Again this motive has to be read between the lines of the narrative: it does not explain the prohibition after the Confession and the Transfiguration; and it has to face the fact that, apart from the Confession of Peter, the disciples seem no nearer to understanding Jesus at the close than at the beginning of the ministry, and that they desert him at his trial.

There are other difficulties surrounding the Marcan representation of the Messiahship to which it is unnecessary here to refer. We have recalled the above points in order to draw attention to a remarkable attempt to treat the problem on new lines. It is contained in the volume by Dr. W. Wrede, of which the title is given at the beginning of this article.

Readers of "The Seat of Authority" will remember that Dr. Martineau cut the knot of these difficulties by arguing that the identification of Jesus with the Messianic figure was the first act of Christian mythology, and that Jesus made no claim to the Messiahship. In this argument Dr. Martineau was not, and did not claim to be, a pioneer, but not even his championship of it availed to disturb the general critical judgment that the Messiahship of Jesus, however difficult to interpret, is yet one of the securest elements in the gospel tradition. Wrede's theory is the same as Dr. Martineau's, though he reaches it by a line of argument that is almost entirely original.

Wrede starts from an examination of the evangelical, especially Marcan, tradition, and maintains that it was the belief in the resurrection of Jesus which first led men to think he was the Messiah. So Paul expressly declares that Jesus was declared to be the Son of God by the resurrection; and this declaration, made at a time when as yet the earliest gospel had not been written, constitutes the oldest tradition we know. According to the narrative of Acts, also, it was not until after the resurrection that the disciples received the Spirit which conveyed the illumination as to the real character of Jesus. And according to the same book it was the Christhood of Jesus attested by the resurrection which was the main subject of the apostolic preaching.

But if Jesus had not himself claimed to be the Messiah, inevitably by the ordinary working of the human mind, attempts would be made to find in the traditions of his earthly life proofs that the Messiahship was there, and expressed itself in Messianic preaching and in Messianic deeds. And if then the question should arise how the Christ was not recognised as such on earth, the answer would be given that he was, indeed, so recognised, but the secret was guarded until he should have proved his Messiahship by rising after death.

Consequently we should expect to find, if this were the course of development, that the evangelical tradition contains, in addition to the records of the life of Jesus the preacher of righteousness, a number of notices designed to show that he was Messiah. This is precisely what Wrede does find in the gospel of Mark, and it is the way in which he correlates a number of the features of this gospel with the theory of a secret Messiah that constitutes the originality of his argument.

Throughout the gospel we find conflicting elements of thought. On the one hand, in a large portion of the narrative there is no suggestion whatever of Messianic purpose. But side by side with this appear passages which represent Jesus as Messiah, as performing Messianic acts, as uttering Messianic teaching, as taking pains on the very occasions where the Messiahship is most evident, to preserve it a secret from men. These passages, Wrede maintains, are all the result, not of faithful tradition, but of theological doctrine: they are all parts of the artificial machinery provided to explain how Jesus in his earthly life was Messiah, and yet was not recognised. This artificial machinery includes the knowledge of the demoniacs, the injunctions to silence, the relation to the disciples, particularly in the matter of the parabolic teaching.

Examples of Messianic knowledge on the part of demoniacs are found in i. 23-25, i. 34, iii 11-12, v. 6-7, ix. 20. Wrede does not think these can be satisfactorily rationalised into historical occurrences: there is no hint of any particular moral or spiritual excitement in the subjects, no reason why, if there were, it should express itself in a judgment about the person of Jesus concealed from all all others. It seems plain that according to the idea of the evangelist the knowledge of the demons—for it is the demons that speak—is supernatural knowledge, and their knowledge concerns the supernatural Jesus, the one Spirit whose power they must recognise. And so, though in the physical world the fact of the Messiahship is a secret, it is clear truth in the spiritual world. The exclamation "I know thee who thou art" suggests the antithesis that others do not know.

Equally unhistorical, in Wrede's judgment, are the numerous prohibitions against disclosing the Messianic secret. Some of these are imposed on the demoniacs (i. 25, i. 34, iii. 12); others are narrated in the context of other miracles (i. 43-45, v. 43, vii. 36, viii. 26). In the same class fall the charge to Peter after the Confession (viii. 30), and to the disciples after the Transfiguration (ix. 9), and other efforts of Jesus to preserve the Messianic incognito (vii. 24, ix. 30). (The difficulty of the interpreters with these passages is genially illustrated by Wrede in a separate Excursus.) They possess the common feature of attempts to guard a secret, and the manner of the prohibitions suggest, not that Jesus is repudiating a rank to which he had no claim, but that he is guarding from publicity a fact that is true. The artificiality of the injunctions does seem apparent when we observe that they are not effective; and the disciples, in whose presence the various miracles take place, apparently learn nothing, even though their Master's fame as a worker of miracles is spread abroad. Particularly significant is ix. 9, where after the Messianic Transfiguration the narrative proceeds:—

> And as they were coming down from the mountain, he charged them that they should tell no man what things they had seen, save when the Son of Man should have risen again from the dead.

The same time-limit is tacitly present in the other prohibitions.

In the teaching of Jesus Mark makes a distinction between matter for the disciples and matter intended for the public. Thus the public may hear the parables, but according to the passage iv. 11 they are not permitted to understand—upon which Dr. Bruce remarks that it is not credible that Jesus would avow such an inhuman intention as that of keeping the people in ignorance. On Wrede's theory the explanation is simple: the representation of the significance of the parables as reserved for the disciples is another part of the machinery. The Messiahship was a secret from the people; therefore they could not understand the Messiah's teaching. The disciples, however, ultimately became the disclosers of the secret to the world; they are accordingly permitted to understand, for to them is given the "mystery" of the kingdom, including, of course, the Messiahship. Wrede notes that in the parables explained to the disciples there is nothing that might not perfectly well have been addressed to the public at large; it is not, in any real sense, mysterious.

This outline of Wrede's argument will be sufficient to show its main character. It will be seen that he raises the question as to whether Jesus claimed Messianic rank into a new region; and it is evident that now it must be faced not only for its own intrinsic importance for the life of Jesus and Christology, but for its collateral bearing on the credibility of the gospels. The strength of his position is that it offers to explain so many of the difficulties of Mark with a single formula; those numerous features which have been ascribed to the love of this evangelist for the mysterious receive an adequate explanation. Sometimes, it must be admitted, he presses his exegesis too hard in this direction, and so commits from the opposite side the same error as those critics who are always finding evidences of the eye-witness and the graphic narrator in some very ordinary phrases. In the main, however, his argument is not radical in its methods, though it may be in its results; and it is the more important to emphasise this fact just now, when Cheyne's textual criticism and van Manen's performances on an unsupported tight-rope are being adduced as the consequences of deserting tradition. Nor can Wrede's theory be pronounced a priori impossible; for though Mark is our earliest gospel, it is as credible that it should contain a dogmatic development of the primary tradition as that the other gospels should develop Mark's account, which undoubtedly they do. It is to be hoped that the further studies which Wrede promises in this subject will soon appear. In the meantime, it can scarcely be said that his theory is complete without some more adequate explanation than is offered in this volume of features of the narrative such as the Messianic entry into Jerusalem, and particularly the unanimous tradition that it was on account of his Messianic claims that Jesus was put to death. A TROUBLED VISION.

AMONG the writers of the younger generation whose names were unknown ten years ago, but who have since been "knocking at the door" to some purpose, Mr. H. G. Wells occupies a position somewhat by himself. Owing his popularity to the production of volume after volume of fiction—we think there must be a dozen or more of these by this time standing to his credit—Mr. Wells's particular distinction rests upon the fact that he has brought to the business of novel-writing some very unusual qualifications—a thorough scientific training which, allied to a vivid imagination, has constantly supplied him with unhackneyed plots, and a keen interest in the complex problems of social ethics, especially as affected by modern advances in the subjugation of the forces of nature. While seemingly occupied only with the contrivance of ingenious tales dealing with as yet unrealised developments in the progress of mechanics, chemistry, biology, and so forth, it has been impossible not to notice that this writer was all the time engaged in more serious speculations, for which his narratives were merely the vehicle; while to all appearances merely bent upon amusing himself and his readers with fairy-tales of science, he was really applying his mind to a number of the most pressing questions of to-day — questions likely to become more pressing to-morrow and the day after. In his very first volume, "The Time Machine," we had, interwoven with the external incidents of the "time traveller's" story, a striking and impressive sketch of the human race in its decadence, hundreds of thousands of years hence. The unexplored future, and what it may hold in store for humanity, has exercised a constant fascination over Mr. Wells; he has returned to the theme repeatedly, notably in that grimly satirical romance, "When the Sleeper Wakes," and in the most elaborate of his "Tales of Time and Space," in both of which the ruthless rule in the twenty-second century of an oligarchy based on money-power is depicted, in pigments sombre enough to give pause to the most exuberant sociological optimist.

"Anticipations."

But precisely because Mr. Wells is more than a dilettante, precisely because his interest in these large concerns is of a serious nature, he was bound after awhile to seek a less irresponsible medium for the expression of his views than that of fantastic romance; and in his brilliant volume of "Anticipations," an eighth and cheaper edition of which is now before the public, he undertook the task of setting forth constructively what he believes to be the effects likely to be brought about in the life and thought of the near future by the mechanical and scientific advance now in process of accomplishment.

With the social changes predicted by the author we are in this article only indirectly concerned; it is consoling at any rate to find that he has seen reason to give up the extreme gloom of his earlier forecast, and no longer thinks that tyrannical power will be concentrated in the hands of a junta of unscrupulous multi-billionaires, holding oppressive sway over the whole earth. Instead, he foresees the rise and eventual rule of a strong and "efficient" class, the real producers of the world's wealth and guardians of its welfare—men of science, teachers, physicians—who by the sheer logic of events will come to relieve the purely ornamental and "played-out" governing caste of Europe of a burden which that caste is no longer fit to bear with safety.

What of Religion?

It is Mr. Wells's sketch of the religious views obtaining among the members of this new aristocracy which naturally interests us most. Looking at the great mass of the people, he predicts the decay of Protestant orthodoxy, especially among the better educated, and a very considerable revival of Catholicism, whose venerable traditions and picturesqueness will once more prove irresistibly attractive to the inefficient elements of the population—both to the luxurious and to the submerged orders. But the crucial part of the subject is reached when Mr. Wells comes to describe the type of religion likely, according to him, to be the prevalent one among the capable, efficient class of the future, the class—and by implication the type of religion—with which he feels himself most in sympathy. Believing him to be very gravely in error in his whole handling of this topic, and lest we should be doing an injustice to this very acute and honest writer, we will quote the actual words in which he gives a succinct account of what he calls the "spacious and confident theism" of the future as seen by him:—

> Quite inevitably, these men [the efficient élite] will be religious men. Being themselves men of will and purpose, they will be disposed to find, and consequently they will find, an effect of purpose in the totality of things. All science and most modern religious systems presuppose the universe to be one and systematic, and held together by some omnipresent quality; and this is, to anyone not too anxious to quibble, to believe in God.

Unsatisfying Exposition.

Now these sentences require careful examination; for with all their seeming broad tolerance and brave phrases about "inevitable religiousness," they amount, in our view, to nothing less than an absolute negation of religion as that term is generally understood. At the outset, it is far from reassuring to find the edifice of faith based on the circumstance that certain men, finding certain qualities in themselves, will be disposed to find, and consequently will find, an effect of these qualities in the totality of things: we should say that such a procedure opened the door to a boundless and most dangerous subjectivity. But, further, we are warned against an easy acceptance of Mr. Wells's generalities by the absence of any qualification of the kind of will and purpose manifested in the world, according to him; and by the similar vagueness as to the character of the omnipresent quality by which the universe is held together. With every desire to practise the widest inclusiveness, we should require to know a little more than Mr. Wells vouchsafes us on these points, before acquiescing in his dictum that to believe in this undefined quality was tantamount to believing in God. Is this pervading and sustaining quality rightly described as love? Are the will and purpose shown forth in the universe good? Only on these questions being answered in the affirmative shall we concede to Mr. Wells the right to call his statement of belief by the name of theism, or, indeed, of religion. But does Mr. Wells allow his statement to be amplified or interpreted in the sense just indicated? Some further quotation will prove the contrary. "I believe," he tells us, "that these prevailing men of the future . . . will presume to no knowledge whatever, will presume to no possibility of knowledge, of the real being of God at all." "To men of the 'kinetic' type, belief in God so manifest as purpose is irresistible; and to all lucid minds the being of God, save as that general atmosphere of imperfectly apprehended purpose, is incomprehensible." "In the thought of God," we are further informed, "the antagonism between good and evil vanishes," for "God is no moralist"; and to men who think thus "the idea of airing their egotisms in God's presence through prayer, or any such personal intimacy," will appear "absurd."

Misleading Terminology.

Now, upon so amazing an utterance as this we have a twofold comment to offer. Firstly, that while Mr. Wells's own candour and good faith are, of course, beyond question, it is rendering no service to men's clarity of reasoning and mental integrity to introduce such a confusion of thought and language as that of which he shows himself guilty. We used to hear, formerly, agnosticism spoken of as a kind of high-polite for atheism; but here we have a "confident and spacious theism," which on examination turns out to be the merest and vaguest agnosticism. The whole difference is this, that the agnostic, after stating his deliberate conclusion that "the power which the universe manifests is utterly inscrutable," very rightly abstains from affixing to that unknowable power the utterly inappropriate name of God; nor would it occur to him to miscall by the term "religion" a system of thought which excludes worship and prayer.

The Scientific Mind Inapt.

Our second comment is provoked by the question which inevitably suggests itself: How is it that so clever a man as Mr. Wells so hopelessly misconceives the nature of religion as to offer us under that designation something which no one with an inkling of what religion is will accept as such? The answer is, that we see in the author's unfortunate treatment of this theme another instance of the almost proverbial blunders of the scientific mind when making an excursion into the territory of religion. The scientific mind is firmly convinced, as a rule, that its own methods, weights and measures are of universal application—it tends to ignore the rule that spiritual things are spiritually discerned—and, applying its own standards, proceeds to deliver judgment without a trace of diffidence, without suspecting that conclusions so arrived at are in the nature of the case bound to be faulty. Science discloses, or appears to disclose, no ground for this or that religious belief —ergo, comes the ready inference, no such ground exists. Such processes of reasoning would be merely ludicrous were it not the case that the deliverances of the man of science upon religion—i.e., upon a subject on which he is not a specialist—are listened to with profound respect by a large section of the public.

The True Essence of Religion.

What thinkers of the type of Mr. Wells need to recognise is, that in the domain of essential religion the writs of physical science do not run, its methods are out of court, and the results attained by such methods will neither gain nor lose a verdict. To quote some words used by the present writer in the same connection elsewhere,* when we want to know the permanent elements of religion, we shall be better employed in listening to the intuitions of our soul than in going to the chemical or biological laboratory. We shall find there first of all that the very essence of religion is not an intellectual conviction, however clear, but a sense of communion, however dim. We shall not be at all disturbed by the discovery that science does not confirm or demonstrate what is absolutely outside the province of science to take cognisance of, any more than by the discovery that a barometer does not register degrees of temperature, or that a telescope tells us nothing about bacteria. It is through other, fitter than scientific channels that there comes to us the knowledge of a holy and living God to whom good and evil are most significant realities, who hears and hallows prayer, who is, in short, not our Creator only, but our Father. That the methods of science are impotent to reveal such a One to us demonstrates, after all, no more than the impotence of the methods of science, not the non-existence of those qualities and attributes in God whereof our consciences and the testimonies of His chosen messengers assure us. It demonstrates no more than the inapplicability of the methods of one science to the problems of another.

A Better Hope.

In this same volume of "Anticipations," Mr. Wells has already given proof that he is not above—or rather, beneath—explicitly disavowing opinions formerly expressed by himself, but now seen by him to be erroneous. There is, therefore, room for the hope that a writer of so much acuteness and sincerity will some day discover how inadequate is the conception of religion which we have felt it our duty in this article to criticise—a conception of the Deity which reduces the living, loving God to the rank of a spectral purpose, impersonal, unpitying, unholy, eternally and dismally indifferent to good and evil. There is room for the hope also that he will revise before long the notion, embraced and enunciated by him with a curious lightness of heart, that a short hundred years will suffice to eliminate those religious instincts of adoration, confession, thanksgiving and supplication which all history shows to be inwoven in the very texture of human nature.

* See the "Christian World Pulpit," July 9, 1902.

It is too late in the day to persuade the world that the outcome of science must be agnosticism; it certainly will not do to present to us a virtual agnosticism and reassure us by calling it religion. Science and a certain type of pre-scientific theology may be, we know they are, incompatibles; but Religion itself—"the soul's own sense of God"—is the same, unchanging, undying, yesterday, to-day, and for ever.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

MANCHESTER DISTRICT.

Of work there is no end. As soon as one enterprise is ended the need for another presents itself, and seems to claim that it is of more importance than any of its predecessors. When our winter engagements slacken, and we get near the end of our programme, we are inclined to think that we have got through all special efforts for a time; but what a delusion it is! As soon as the summer holidays are over the forecasts of work begin to come in from all quarters, and we are convinced that we shall probably be busier than ever. At any rate, that is our experience here in Manchester. Last winter there were so many bazaars and sales of work that it was excusable for us to dream of a respite for twelve months or so. A vain hope, alas! No sooner did October arrive than we were warned by circular or otherwise that certain institutions and churches had on hand schemes which would necessitate the raising of money, and so subscription lists and bazaar appeals are once again the order of the day. There is nothing individually quite so big certainly as the £10,000 Manchester District Bazaar of a few years back; but the aggregate needs that have been announced probably amount to more than that sum. It is marvellous where all the money comes from, and yet we confidently expect that all we want will be forthcoming. Platt Chapel opened the ball early in October with a sale of work, which was very successful. The amount raised, inclusive of donations, was about £200—sufficient to enable the friends there to realise the object they had in view. I will refer only to two other similar, though much larger, efforts which are being forced upon our attention in good business fashion.

The first is a bazaar which is to be held next spring in the Lower Mosley-street Sunday School, for the purpose of augmenting the funds of the Manchester District Sunday School Association, which embraces nearly all the Unitarian Sunday-schools in Lancashire and Cheshire. The minimum sum to be aimed at is £1,000. Its object is a laudable one. The money is required to liquidate a debt of £200 which is still remaining on the Holiday Home at Great Hucklow; then to extend the Convalescent Home accommodation at South Shore, Blackpool, so that elder scholars and young teachers may also obtain the rest and fresh air which under existing circumstances are restricted to the younger scholars. Some of the applications for admission are quite pathetic; but they have to be firmly though reluctantly refused. Increased accommodation is, therefore, urgently needed. And finally, a considerable sum of money is required for the general work of the Association, which at present is lagging owing to inadequate financial support.

The work of organisation has already been begun, and subscriptions are steadily coming in. It is certain that the Executive Committee will keep us all at high pressure until the date of the bazaar, when, let us hope, their effort will be crowned with success. I believe there is a growing seriousness on the part of those who are actively engaged in Sunday-school work. They are realising, with much anxiety, that the changes which are likely to take place in our system of national education will increase their responsibility in connection with religious instruction, and demand of them a higher equipment.

There is a good deal of grumbling at times on the part of ministers and superintendents at the difficulty in obtaining teachers for the Sunday-school, and especially teachers who are in every sense qualified for their tasks. There never will be a superfluity of "the salt of the earth"; but where there is enthusiasm on the part of ever so few it does somehow or other invariably carry us through. We have in Manchester two or three very remarkable examples of this fact. Only a few years ago the school in connection with our Willert-street Domestic Mission had dwindled down to about a hundred scholars; but fresh energy and life were infused into it, and latterly a band of earnest young men and women have so strengthened the missionary's hands that over 400 scholars are now on the books, and considerably over 300 are in weekly attendance. It is much the same at the new Mission in Bradford, while at Renshaw-street, another Domestic Mission, a rapid development has taken place during the last twelve months or so. At all three centres further growth is now impossible, owing to lack of accommodation. Now, these three schools, and such as these, most of all feel the value of such institutions as the Holiday Home and the Convalescent Home; and, therefore, it is hardly conceivable that there should not be a hearty and generous response to the appeal which is being made at the present time by the Manchester District Sunday School Association.

The other and largest bazaar to which I have referred is being organised by the East Cheshire Christian Union, which has important Church work on hand, but cannot adequately grapple with it owing to serious lack of funds. It does not include any of the Manchester churches, but its own churches are situated within a very short radius of this city, and so it seems the most natural thing that it should hold its bazaar in this populous centre, which is so accessible to all concerned. The sum aimed at is £5,000, half of which is to be permanently invested, and the other half allocated for church building and similar purposes.

Talking of Sunday-schools, I should like to say how deeply moved we who were present at the annual meeting of the Manchester Unitarian Sunday School Union were by an address delivered by Mrs. Manning, of Sheffield, on the way in which moral and religious teaching may be conveyed to the younger children. If we could all learn her secret our work as teachers would be much more satisfactory and profitable; but she clearly exemplified in herself the fact that personal magnetism counts for a great deal, and so the mediocre teacher must struggle on, imitating as best he may—yet only imitating—the genius for clear and simple and attractive exposition of the subject in hand which certainly is characteristic of Mrs. Manning in a marked degree.

The event, however, which has aroused most interest amongst Unitarians in Manchester recently was the presentation to the Trustees of the Memorial Hall of a portrait of Alderman Harry Rawson, J.P., painted by Sir George Reid, President of the Royal Scotch Academy. This portrait is temporarily on view in the Corporation Art Gallery, and is pronounced by competent critics to be the finest example of the portrait painter's art in Manchester. We are all proud of it. It was subscribed for exclusively by members of our group of churches in various parts of the kingdom. I need not repeat what was so fully reported at the time in your columns; but having acted as secretary to the fund I do just know more than anybody else how deep and genuine was the feeling of esteem and reverence so universally entertained towards the man whom we sought to honour, and whose presentment we desired to hand down to posterity. Everybody regards Mr. Rawson as a friend. Though himself so unassuming, his good works have happily not been hidden from us, and throughout the country there are men and women working earnestly in the cause of humanity who frankly acknowledge his long years of faithful service as their incentive, and who are trying to put his ideas and principles into practice in their own little corners of the vineyard. Mr. Rawson is advancing in years—some call him affectionately "our Grand Old Man"—and we rejoice that he has given us this opportunity of crowning his old age with our laurel wreath, and displaying some tangible proof of our regard and esteem. It is hoped that the residue of the fund will be sufficient to found an annual prize in connection with the Unitarian Home Missionary College, to be called the "Harry Rawson" Prize.

On Wednesday evening, Oct. 29, the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, M.A., delivered, in the Memorial Hall, Manchester, the first of a series of lectures on "The Bible in the Nineteenth Century." His audience filled the hall, and were in wrapt attention throughout. The chair was taken by Professor A. S. Peake, M.A., of the Primitive Methodist College, who, in his opening remarks, expressed his admiration of the lecturer's scholarship and love of truth. The lecture was a remarkably comprehensive and concise statement of the development of Old Testament criticism, under the heading of "Changed Views of the Law." A considerable number of those present were members of other denominations; and from letters received we know that many orthodox ministers would gladly attend these lectures were it not for their regular Wednesday evening services which demand their presence in their own churches. Of course, the scholarly exposition is the main thing; but in addition to that it puts heart into us to be drawn together into one assembly, as we were last Wednesday, and made to feel that we are integral parts of a much larger body of men and women who are not afraid to be confronted with new truths, but who welcome them as higher revelations of Deity.

Some months ago I contributed to your columns an account of a new scheme of extended usefulness which the Manchester District Association had offered to its constituent churches. Monthly meetings are already arranged up to and including May; and thus far there is every reason for feeling satisfied that the idea embodied is an excellent and helpful one. On the first Saturday in October meetings were held at Oldham; in the afternoon a Conference, at which a Paper was read and discussed, and in the evening a public meeting. Last Saturday Oldham-road was the place of meeting. A goodly congregation assembled in the church for the afternoon service, which was very hearty and impressive. Tea was provided in the school, after which a meeting was held in the same building, presided over by Mr. George H. Leigh. There was a very good attendance, and everybody felt it a pleasure to be there. Between the speeches the well-trained church choir rendered part-songs and solos. About fifteen members of the Governing Body were present, and nearly all the churches in the district were represented. At such centres as Oldham-road, where the work is very hard, and apt at times to be discouraging, such a gathering as that of Saturday last must be exceedingly helpful, and will in due time bear fruit. It is the sense of comradeship that needs intensifying in so many of our churches, and the recognition that we are all working combinedly in a common cause.

I find my brother ministers all working at well-thought-out schemes of pulpit usefulness. If able preaching could fill our churches we should not have many empty pews; but the time for our public popularity has not yet come, and it may be that we have not yet wholly solved the secret of success. Doubtless much can be done when pulpit and pew work in double harness, both firmly believing in the efficiency of hearty co-operation in all branches of Church activity, and each as anxious as the other in spreading abroad a knowledge of our faith until it shall cover the earth as the waters cover the channels of the deep.

CHARLES ROPER.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

We have received several long Reports too late for insertion this week, and must beg Correspondents to send in Church News by Wednesday, if possible. News which only arrives on Thursday should be as brief as it can be made.

Ainsworth.—The congregation has decided to adopt the revised edition of the "Essex Hall Hymnal," in place of "Hymns for the Christian Church and Home," and will begin its use with the new year.

Bolton: Unity Church.—The late Mr. Frank Taylor, J.P., has left the sum of £1,000 (free of duty) to the congregation of Unity Church, Deane-road, the interest to be applied in augmentation of the annual income of the church.

Boston.—Mr. John Fretwell, of Providence, R.I., paid a long-promised visit to this town to see the place from which the Pilgrim Fathers set sail for Holland before their departure for America. Accompanied by Miss C. Richmond, he visited the church where John Cotton once preached, and the cells where the Puritans were incarcerated; and on Sunday evening, in Spain-lane Chapel, he gave an address on "The Pilgrim Fathers," and illustrated his subject with lantern slides. This use of the lantern marks a new departure. It was an experiment, and is to be repeated once a month. The first attempt to teach by the eye as well as the ear was very successful, a good audience filling the chapel.

Carmarthen.—Principal Evans has been elected a member of the Town Council, to assist in the administration of the Education Bill.

Dukinfield.—The annual choir sermons were preached in the Old Chapel by the Rev. H. S. Tayler, M.A, on Sunday last, Nov. 2. Over 400 were present at the morning service, and over 700 at the evening. The collections amounted to £36 1s. 1d. The parents' party was well attended. The Rev. C. E. Oliver, B.A., and Mr. James Kerfoot were the principal speakers. The collections at recent successful Harvest Thanksgiving services, amounting to £34 10s. 6d., have been handed over to the Sunday-school fund. The Rev. H. S. Tayler has been elected Chairman of the Dukinfield School Board.

Hale.—On Wednesday, Oct. 15, a meeting of the Hale Chapel congregation was held in the school to welcome the Rev. A. Leslie Smith, B.A., as newly-appointed minister. After tea the meeting was addressed by the Chairman, Mr. Albert Nicholson, by Mr. Robert Wolff, and Mr. Joseph Moore, offering a welcome on behalf of the congregation; by the Revs. E. L. H. Thomas and Dendy Agate as neighbouring ministers; and by the Rev. T. Lloyd Jones, as a former minister of Hale Chapel. The Rev. A. Leslie Smith replied. Apologies for absence had been received from other friends, including the Rev. J. Crowther Hirst, also a former minister. Several visitors from Altrincham gave the encouragement of their presence, and also some music. The first meeting of the Band of Hope took place on Oct. 29, under the direction of Miss M. C. Nicholson. The minister presided and gave an address, musically illustrated.

Halifax.—On Thursday week, at the first congregational social evening of the session, in the Northgate-end schoolroom, a cordial welcome was given to the Rev. P. E. Richards, B.A., as assistant minister to the Rev. F. E. Millson. Mr. Richards, who is an Oxford graduate, and had been for two years at Manchester College, came to Halifax strongly recommended by Professor Carpenter. Mr. J. Sagar, chapel warden, presided, and expressed great regret that Mr. Millson was prevented by illness from being present. He offered, on behalf of the congregation, a very cordial welcome to Mr. Richards. A letter was read from Mr. Millson, in which he said: "I should have liked to join in your words of welcome to Mr. Richards, and to have expressed the confidence that I feel that his coming may be a source of strength to our work. With two ministers and with all the work of many members of the congregation, we should not merely make up losses of school and church; we should advance. There is one thing in which improvement may be attempted. It has been one of my hard and depressing problems for many years, that out of the small number of members so large a proportion are only occasional attenders at the services—not once-a-day worshippers, but special occasion visitors only. Perhaps the new influence which Mr. Richards brings may make itself felt in some improvement in this matter. If I had been able to be present this evening, I should have had but one word for Mr. Richards—the assurance that in his work of the pulpit and our social work he will move with a complete freedom of word and action." Mr. Teal, as representing the Sunday-school, and Mr. Stott, one of the teachers, extended a very warm welcome to Mr. Richards, who, in acknowledging the welcome, said it was very moving to him to stand at the outset of his duties, and at the beginning of his career as a minister. He felt that their cordial welcome sprang out of the hospitality of their minds, and that it was not so much for him as for the fact that he was to have the privilege of assisting Mr. Millson. Nothing had brought him more sincere delight than to think that he was to be assistant to someone much older and much wiser than he, and infinitely kind, as he had found him, and whom he could respect. He was proud to think that there was freedom of speech in their pulpit, and he thanked them for that liberty. During the evening a musical programme was given by members of the choir under the direction of Mr. Arthur Wilson, organist of the church.

London: Bell-street.—We are sorry to announce that owing to ill-health the Rev. B. Kirkman Gray has been compelled to resign the position of missionary at Bell-street. At the meeting of the Committee of the London Domestic Mission Society on Oct. 30, the following resolution, moved by the Chairman (Mr. P. M. Martineau) and seconded by Mr. Chatfeild Clarke, was unanimously passed:—"The Committee receive with very great regret the resignation of the Rev. B. Kirkman Gray, and in accepting the same they beg to assure him of their sincere sympathy with him in his illness, and to convey their high appreciation of his and Mrs. Gray's most valuable work at Bell-street, of the unwearying efforts of both of them to further the objects for which the mission exists."

London: Hampstead.—In anticipation of the Rev. Edgar Daplyn's farewell services at Rosslyn-hill Chapel, the treasurer and two friends, on behalf of the committee and congregation, lately presented Mr. Daplyn with a letter of thanks for his services during his three years' stay, accompanied by a cheque for 300 guineas; and at a subsequent meeting of a few friends a further presentation was made consisting of a cheque for the purchase of books, a watch for Mrs. Daplyn, and an easy chair, with a suitable letter of affectionate regard for both. The presentations were acknowledged by Mr. Daplyn with much feeling on behalf of himself and Mrs. Daplyn.

London: Lewisham.—The Literary and Scientific Society in connection with this congregation maintains its high position in the neighbourhood, in spite of the multiplication of such societies. Indeed, it almost looks as if its admirable lectures and good attendances had inspired its neighbours and called them to renewed activity. On Monday evening Mr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C., gave a delightful lecture on "Browning's Poetic Method."

London: Mansford-street.—The thirty-fifth annual gathering of past and present scholars, teachers, and friends of Mansford-street and Spicer-street was held on Wednesday, Nov. 5. During the evening the Rev. John Ellis, on behalf of the present teachers and scholars, gave a hearty welcome to all the visitors. Songs and recitations contributed to the enjoyment of the evening. The rooms were decorated with flowers and evergreens, kindly sent by Lady Durning-Lawrence, Mrs. Squire, and Mrs. Crompton Jones.

London: Rhyl-street.—An excellent second-hand lantern has been bought for the Mission for £7 1s., and the money in payment was collected in a few days by a Hampstead lady among friends of the Mission there and a few in other parts of London.

London: Stepney.—The Central Postal Mission Conferences at College Chapel, which have been held monthly for some time past, have proved of great interest. Last Sunday afternoon the Rev. G. Critchley, B.A., delivered a singularly able address on the subject of the miracles recorded in the four Gospels. Formerly, he said, we had to believe in Jesus Christ because of the miracles; now, if we accept the miracles, it is because we love Jesus Christ. We were told that if we rejected the miracles we should lose Christ; but the real Christ, the teacher of great truths, the example, the perfect man, would stand before us in a splendid reality, so that the Christian religion would be fitted to become the religion of all the world. An interesting discussion followed the address.

London: Stratford.—Four special Sunday evening services, under the auspices of the London District Unitarian Society, arranged by the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, were held during October. The preachers and subjects were as follows:—Mr. T. Elliot, "The Dual Function of Seed" (Harvest Service); the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, "What Think ye of Christ"; the Rev. W. H. Rose, of Walthamstow, "What Unitarians Think about God"; the Rev. L. Jenkins Jones, "The Place and Importance of Reason in Religion." On the whole the congregations were larger than usual, and included several strangers. On Wednesday, Oct. 29, a very successful congregational soirée was held. Addresses were given by the Revs. T. E. M. Edwards and W. H. Rose, Mr. T. Elliot, and others, music being provided by members of the Young People's Guild. The societies in connection with the church are now in active work. The Young People's Guild, under the superintendence of the Rev. W. H. Rose, has arranged a good programme. The average attendance of the Sunday-school is about 120, and of the Band of Hope over 70. Adult helpers are greatly needed, a special want being a lady to conduct a class of elder girls.

Manchester: Lower Mosley-street.—At the evening service on Sunday last, an increasing gathering of friends welcomed a visit from the Rev. S. A. Steinthal, and his words in every part of the service, as well as his earnest, eloquent address, were listened to with warm appreciation. It was encouraging to be favoured by the presence of one who is loved by old and young for his long years of service to Lower Mosley-street Schools. The Rev. A. Cobden Smith announced a course of Sunday evening addresses on "The Life of James Martineau and its Lessons," as follows:—I. The Preacher. II. The Defender of Faith. III. The Unitarian. IV. The Philosopher.

Mossley.—On Sunday the chapel anniversary sermons were preached by the Rev. George Evans, M.A., of Gorton. Notwithstanding the great distress in the town, the collections amounted to £36.

Newchurch (Re-opening of School).—Considerable alterations have recently been made to the interior of the school, in order to increase the classroom accommodation. A new tea and lecture room, capable of seating over 100 persons—divisible into two classrooms by folding partitions—has been provided, with separate staircase from body of school. The remaining classrooms have also been enlarged and better ventilated. The whole of the school premises have been renovated and decorated, and presented an attractive appearance on Saturday last, when the re-opening took place. Tea was served in the new room to over 300 persons, and afterwards a grand concert was held in the large schoolroom. During the evening addresses were given by the chairman, Mr. Thomas Kenyon, the Rev. J. J. Shaw, M.A., minister, the Rev. Jenkyn Thomas, Rawtenstall, and Mr. J. H. Lord, chairman and treasurer of the Alterations Committee. The cost of the alterations and renovation will be about £350, towards which the sum of £256 has been raised by subscriptions and donations from members and friends. The work has the hearty approval of all, and it is expected the remaining £100 will soon be cleared off, as the result of the united efforts of the scholars and members of the congregation and friends.

Nottingham.—The opening meeting of the season in connection with the High Pavement Historical Society was held in the schoolrooms on Friday evening, Oct. 31, when the Rev. Alexander Gordon, M.A., delivered a lecture on "The Story of Salters' Hall." The President of the Society (Mr. J. C. Warren) occupied the chair, supported by upwards of eighty members and friends. Mr Gordon dealt with his subject in a masterly and interesting fashion, and declared that in a very real sense the Salters' Hall meeting issued what might be called the charter of the liberties of congregations, whether they were Unitarian or Trinitarian. The general prosperity of Dissent from that time began very considerably to decline, and people came to be suspicious of each other, but they must remember that every gain in this world involved a loss, and that gain was the compensation for loss. The future of the liberties of English Dissent was secured by this rift at Salters' Hall. The vote of thanks to the lecturer was proposed by a Baptist, and seconded by a Presbyterian minister, and another Presbyterian minister seconded the vote of thanks to the President.

Parkstone.—On Sunday week the Rev. A. Hood administered the rite of Christian dedication, and afterwards gave an impressive address on "Baptism." In the evening Mr. Bushrod spoke on "Our Duties as Citizens."

Southend-on-Sea.—A well-attended meeting was held on Wednesday week at the Darnley-road Unitarian Church, presided over by Mr. E. H. Draper, J.P., C.C., to hear an address by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie on "The Education Question." Mr. Bowie was well received, and his lecture listened to with attention. Alderman J. H. Burrows, J.P., C.C., moved a comprehensive resolution condemning the Bill now before Parliament, which, after a lively discussion, was carried with only two dissentients.

Wakefield.—On Sunday last, Nov. 2, the 150th anniversary of the opening of the present chapel in Westgate was celebrated by special services, conducted by the Rev. J. Collins Odgers, B.A., of Bury, and the Rev. Andrew Chalmers. This is the third place of worship which has been used by the congregation, the first dating back to 1672, the second to 1697, while the existing building was dedicated on Nov. 1, 1752. In order to familiarise the congregation with the history of the time, Mr. Chalmers had previously given a course of six Sunday evening lectures on the annals of the chapel, and this enabled the congregation to enter heartily into the commemoration. The sermons preached by Mr. Odgers were highly appreciated, and the subjects most appropriate to the occasion. At the children's service in the afternoon it was gratifying to notice what interest and knowledge even the younger Sunday scholars showed in the old life of the place. On the following evening the congregational soirée was held, when more than 170 people partook of tea, after which there was a meeting of a commemorative character. This was presided over by the Rev. A. Chalmers, who spoke on the Wakefield of a century and a-half ago; and interesting addresses were also given by the Rev. J. C. Odgers and the Rev. Henry Rawlings, of York. A musical programme was also ably given, and the gathering was in all respects successful and enjoyable.

Whitchurch.—On Wednesday, Oct. 22, a special service was conducted in the Church of the Saviour by the Rev. J. B. Higham, of Wolverhampton; and on Oct. 29, by the Rev. J. C. Street, of Shrewsbury. These services have been well attended, and have been in every way satisfactory.

Mr. John Morley, who received the remarkable library of the late Lord Acton as a gift from Mr. Andrew Carnegie, has now presented it to the University of Cambridge (where Lord Acton was Professor of History), only stipulating that the books should be kept together, and as the Acton Library, preserve the identity and character of the collection, and the memory of the distinguished historian who made it. Writing to the Duke of Devonshire, Chancellor of the University, to announce his gift, Mr. Morley said:—

For some time I played with the fancy of retaining it for my own use and delectation. But I am not covetous of splendid possessions; life is very short; and such a collection is fitter for a public and undying institution than for any private individual.

And as to the character of the Library, he adds:—

It was collected by Lord Acton to be the material for a history of Liberty, the emancipation of Conscience from Power, and the gradual substitution of Freedom for Force in the government of men. That guiding object gives to these sixty or seventy thousand volumes a unity that I would fain preserve by placing them where they can be kept intact and in some degree apart. . . . The books will, in the opinion of scholars more competent to judge than I, be a valuable instrument of knowledge, but that is hardly all. The very sight of this vast and ordered array in all departments, tongues, and times, of the history of civilised governments, the growth of faiths and institutions, the fluctuating movements of human thought, all the struggles of Churches and creeds, the divers types of great civil and ecclesiastical governors, the diverse ideals of States—all this will be to the ardent scholar a powerful stimulus to thought. And it was Acton himself who said that the gifts of historical thinking are better than historical learning. His books are sure to inspire both, for multitudinous though they be, they concentrate the cardinal problems of modern history.

To Correspondents.—Letters, &c., received from the following:—G. V. C.; J. D.; G. E. E.; L. M. G.; L. H.; F. E. M.; W. R. M.; R. N.; J. A. P.; M. D. S.; V. R. S.; W. H. S.; A. D. T.; E. M. W.; M. B. W.

Readers who love thrilling romance will feel under a debt of gratitude to

Mr. FRED M. WHITE

for his New Story,

A Shadowed Love,

which will commence this week in

THE CHRISTIAN WORLD.

The New Story will introduce the readers of this great Religious Weekly to an author who has not yet been represented in its pages. "A Shadowed Love," we believe, will put its readers on very good terms with Mr. Fred M. White. It is a story quite out of the common, with a lovely blind heroine, around whom centres a tragic mystery. A struggling young novelist and journalist, living with his sister in London, renders a great service to the heroine's father, who is haunted by mortal fear of some imminent peril arising out of a dark chapter in his past. Dick Stevenson, scenting a mystery, begins to wonder whether there is material for a novel in it, but he soon finds himself a leading actor in a drama more startling and fuller of thickly crowding surprises than any story he had ever ventured to imagine. Those readers who pride themselves on foreseeing the end of a novel from the beginning will find themselves baffled for once. Mr. Fred M. White knows how to keep his secret, and we anticipate that as the story progresses there will be impatient waiting, after each instalment, for the continuation in tens of thousands of homes. As the title implies, the love element is prominent, and the love story told is as fragrant as the favourite violets of the sightless heroine. "A Shadowed Love" is a strong, wholesome romance for tired fathers and mothers, to enable them to shake off the cares of the day during the coming winter evenings, but it may be put without fear into the hands of the younger members of the family.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE second of Professor J. H. Poynting's scientific articles will be published next week, the subject being, "Molecules, Atoms and Corpuscles."

IT will be seen from the Calendar announcements that to-morrow (Sunday) the Rev. Henry Gow, B.A., enters on his ministry at Rosslyn-hill Chapel, Hampstead, in succession to Dr. Brooke Herford. It is a pathetic circumstance that Dr. Herford still waits for his release from the Valley of the Shadow, but will not be able to give his successor that hearty God-speed, and that benediction of the veteran to the strong man taking up the work, which we know he would have given with all his heart. Rosslyn-hill Chapel is rich in memories also of Dr. Sadler's long ministry. The congregation is happy in their choice of a successor, whose whole nature responds to all that was best and noblest in the character and work of his predecessors.

ON Thursday week Mr. Stopford Brooke gave the first of a course of five lectures at University College on "The Rise of Naturalism or the Romantic Movement in Poetry in the Eighteenth Century." The chair was taken by Mr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C., chairman of the committee of the Stopford Brooke Lectureship Fund, and the Botanical Theatre was filled by a large audience, though not overcrowded. Mr. Odgers regretted that Lord Reay, President of the College, had not been able to take the chair at that first lecture, as they had hoped, but he had written, warmly expressing his sense of the advantage of Mr. Brooke's lectures both to the College and to the public. Having congratulated Mr. Brooke on the success of the publication of his book on Browning, in which they who had heard the Browning lectures had a special interest, the chairman made a statement as to the position of the Lectureship Fund. They had made a good beginning, he said, but had by no means enough to secure the permanent establishment of a Chair of English Poetry at the College, which was their aim. They felt, therefore, that they must not trench upon that Fund in any way, but make the current courses of lectures meet their own expenses. Thus they had not been able to issue so many free tickets as formerly. He urged his hearers to make the lectures more widely known, and to become annual subscribers, so as to help towards the permanent establishment of the Lectureship.

MR. BROOKE said that the title announced for this course of lectures was perhaps misleading. He did not mean that Naturalism and Romanticism were interchangeable terms, but the one had led the way to the other. Nearly sixty years elapsed between the last poem of Pope and the first of Wordsworth, and meanwhile the fashion of poetry was completely changed. The change had begun before Pope's death, in the middle of his career. It was a reaction caused by weariness of artificial and conventional poetry, and went back to simple human nature, and to Nature as seen in its wild and uncultivated state. That was the rise of Naturalism. Pope's poetry was of society and the city. If there was any nature in it, it was as in a park, surrounded by a high wall. The people were not admitted. His study of man was of man in London. But then came an awakening in the people of new desires for fuller life, which found expression in the Revolution, and before that in the poetry of Thomson, Gray, and the rest. They returned to the springs of nature and the great world of humanity. They also looked to the past, before the period of conventional life. They turned back to the early Elizabethan poets, and drank deep of the natural humanity in the poetry of Chaucer. This annihilated the one metre which Pope used, which had made poetry artifical, and new lyric measures again entered into poetry. The cold Deism of Pope, with its mechanical universe, stole from humanity one of its highest capacities, the passion of that pursuit of the Unknown, the invisible Infinite, which was at the root of all the arts and religion of mankind. Out of the hunger for the unknown, the perfect, the illimitable of joy and loveliness arose Romanticism. Pope perfected the artificial, and then men cried out for Nature and Naturalism was born; and after that Romanticism. The other lectures of the course are to deal with Thomson, Young, Collins and Gray and others of the transition period.

THE prominence given to the Education Bill in recent elections renders their results of far more than mere party significance. Last week the majority in the Cleveland district was overwhelming against the Bill, and in East Toxteth, though Mr. Rathbone did not succeed in winning the seat, he greatly reduced the Conservative majority. Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman stated without contradiction in Parliament on Tuesday that in the six bye-elections which have occurred since the Government's measure was introduced, the Liberal vote had increased by thirty-nine per cent., and the Conservative had fallen by eight per cent. This is a substantial indication of the state of feeling in the country, other manifestations of which continue in the great meetings held to denounce the Bill. There has been of late an attempt to counter the effect of these meetings by others called in support of the Government, but the irony of events has turned some of these into fresh opposing forces, while others have been quietly dropped since the passing of the Kenyon-Slaney amendment which places the control of religious instruction in the aided denominational schools under the body of managers as a whole. In no case is this change of attitude more noteworthy than in that of the London meeting called for Friday this week by the Bishop of London. Reversing Balaam's rôle, the clerics who came to bless the Bill appear destined to pronounce a curse upon it.

CANON HENSLEY HENSON has written to the Times trenchantly exposing the arrogant spirit which underlies this display of clerical dissatisfaction. He supports the "concession" granted in the amendment as showing "the sincerity of the Anglican contention that what the clergy have throughout cared for is not privilege, but the interest of religion." It is obvious, however, that under the words "the interest of religion" the dissatisfied clerics, with Bishop Gore at their head, would certainly include the idea of the unquestioned supremacy of the consecrated priest. It is an integral part of their scheme of Christianity as an organised force. In vain is the appeal made to the first principles of the gospel; this is their gospel, that to the apostolically accredited representatives of "the Church," and to them alone, is committed the function of teaching in matters of religion, and to do them justice, many of them are fully in earnest to teach, though others, as Canon

Henson points out, are conspicuously absent from the actual work of the schools. Of course, it is equally vain to remind these men that the parish schools really are not theirs, but are held upon trust for the public good. We fear they have, for the most part, hitherto treated these schools as an appanage to the parish church, but we may now be at the beginning of a new era in regard to these things, and if the Government holds to the amendment, as seems probable, that era will, we believe, soon be manifest.

THE expected application of the "guillotine" method of proceeding with the Bill has now been sanctioned by vote of the Commons, and henceforth the divisions upon the respective clauses still before the Committee of the House will take place at stated times, whether debated or not. There was a strong protest against this course, but not a whit too strong. Doubtless the machinery of legislation needs to be kept effective, and to be protected against mere dilatory tactics; but it needs no high imaginative powers to see to what abuses this principle may lead. The present instance is more than sufficiently flagrant. To bring in a Bill which entirely changes the habits of a generation in respect to public elementary schools, and which permanently endows a special class of them, to do this not only without appeal to the constituencies, but in defiance of the most distinct signs of their disapproval, and, moreover, to do this by a measure which has had to be patched and mended in a remarkable degree, and the remainder of which is obviously open to serious criticism, is surely as bad a precedent as could be set. It would appear that real Parliamentary Government is to be given up for a system of bureaucratic tyranny under which no liberties will be safe.

APART from this supremely important matter the history of Parliament's deliberations on the Bill during the past week calls for little comment here. As we stated last week several clauses were then rapidly closured, and on Wednesday the Committee began the discussion of Clause 12. This deals with the establishment of education committees by local education authorities. Considerable alteration has been introduced into the Bill as drafted, and the Government has decided, as Sir William Anson explained, that the local education authority is to be popularly elected and directly responsible to the ratepayers; to have executive power in all matters relating to education within its area; to act through the Education Committee, being bound to ask its advice, and in the absence or unacceptableness of such advice, to act by itself; not to delegate rating or borrowing powers to the committee; and finally to appoint a majority of that committee from within or without its own body. On the last point considerable discussion took place, there being, of course, a strong desire on the Liberal side to secure that at least a majority of the committee should be popularly elected representatives; but, in spite of his having to admit that a committee could be legally appointed, under this clause, with not a single councillor upon it, Sir William Anson maintained his point, and it was carried. In spite of further protest, it was agreed to allow "other bodies"—undefined, but presumably including denominational societies—to "nominate" outside persons for "appointment" by the council. Mr. Balfour accepted, however, an amendment to permit of the appointment of women on the committee, and "if desirable," all members of School Boards existing at the time of the passing of the Act are to be put on the committee.

"WHO is to Blame?" is the title of the Rev. Charles Hargrove's sermon "On our Educational Deficiencies," in this month's Mill Hill Pulpit. Quoting Mr. Balfour in the present year, and Brougham in 1820, in condemnation of our system of education, utterly inadequate and behind the age, Mr. Hargrove recalls the time when, a thousand years ago, Europe looked to England as the centre of light, where the best educators were to be found, and goes on to ask why we have fallen so far below that old ideal. Who has been to blame? The poor have gone hungry, not because they did not care for education, but because the governing classes were indifferent; and while the Church in the old days rendered good service to the cause of education, sectarian differences have been among the chief hindrances to progress.

The fault of the Church has been, and that too only human, that having charged itself with the education of the people it would allow no others to undertake the work, nor permit anyone to teach who did not hold license to do so from the ecclesiastical authorities. So in the days of Wickliffe and the Lollards it vigorously repressed the schools in which children were taught to read the Bible and understand it otherwise than Rome willed. Later on, after the Act of Uniformity, it hindered anyone from being schoolmaster unless he could subscribe the declaration of submission which had driven 2,000 ministers out of home and office. It completed the grievous wrong to learning by closing the doors of the ancient Universities upon all who could not accept its Articles of Religion.

But this is ancient history, and we have no reason to suppose that any other denomination, if it had come to power, would have acted differently. It would be absurd to entertain a grudge against the Established Church of to-day, because it shared the intolerant spirit which was almost universal in days of old. Its sin against the children, for whom otherwise it has done so much, has been that being possessed of an ancient privilege it has been loth to part with it, and up till to-day will not surrender it, but has preferred that the children should have a poor education or none rather than that they should receive it under other auspices than its own.

THIS is still the trouble in the present crisis, and it is for those who set the great cause of education and the interest of the children above all such sectional differences, to use every effort to bring about a better understanding and make an end of the scandal of the country's backwardness and neglect of its highest interest. Thus Mr. Hargrove laments:—

Those who, with the Bishop of this Diocese, plead for "a spirit of magnanimous consideration and a patriotic willingness to sacrifice something to secure a judicial and permanent settlement of a great national question" can scarce obtain a hearing. "A great national question?" It is the greatest of all questions, this of the education of the children of the nation, and the rivalries of parties and Churches are of no account in comparison of it. With them we have to do—we, who care more for the children's welfare than for any party or any Church; we, who are persuaded that the advance of knowledge must be to the advantage of Truth on whichever side Truth may be—with them we have to do only that by way of consideration and compromise we may obtain their assent, and, if possible, their co-operation.

Let the Churchman understand the Nonconformist, and the Protestant enter into the feelings of the Catholic, and so shall some better way be found of settling this all-important question than that of taking advantage of a temporary majority and forcing through Parliament a measure on which we ought all to be agreed. Let us for once be what we profess ourselves, Christians all of us; Christians in love of the children; Christians in kindly consideration of each other's ignorance and infirmity; Christians in resolute endeavour to advance not our sect, or party, or opinion, but the Kingdom of God on earth. Then, and not till then, shall it cease to be the reproach of the Churches of England that it is they who are to blame for past and present deficiencies in the education of English children. And if it so be that the Christianity of England, with all its merits, is responsible for it that the last century found us at its commencement "the worst educated country in Europe," and at its close "the laughing stock of every advanced nation of the world," it shall be so never again. But religion and education shall go hand in hand, and "Knowledge grow from more to more;

But more of reverence in us dwell" from generation to generation.

A LIVERPOOL Church and Chapel Census of attendants at morning and evening service on Sunday, Nov. 2, was published by the Liverpool Daily Post on Tuesday, the figures of a previous census in 1891 being also given for comparison. The actual totals show indeed a considerable increase, but they do not by any means keep pace with the large increase of population. Except in the case of Roman Catholics, the evening congregations are the most numerous, the early morning masses no doubt attracting those who in Protestant Churches would form the evening congregations. Of the evening congregations the totals give roughly 41,000 Anglicans, 50,000 Nonconformists, and 15,000 Roman Catholics. The Methodist evening total is 16,195; the Roman Catholic morning total, 19,599. Of the Congregational and Baptist Churches, the latter show somewhat larger totals than the former, but then they include Dr. Aked's congregations at Pembroke Chapel, morning 1,375, evening, 1,973, which are in themselves more than twice the grand total of the Unitarians:—Morning 491, evening 775, the former a falling off, the latter a gain on 1891.

THE leading article of the British Weekly of Oct. 30 was devoted by Dr. Robertson Nicoll to "James Martineau," partly in review of the "Life and Letters," and partly to an independent estimate of Martineau's character and work. As to the Biography Dr. Nicoll expresses disappointment that so little is added to our knowledge, and that it is a "shadowy figure" that is presented in these volumes. Speaking for himself Dr. Nicoll says:—"What is most admirable in Martineau's life is its lofty and serene dignity." And a little further on he says:—

To many of us the greatest wonder about Martineau is his style. He had an unrivalled mastery of expression. He could turn out, apparently without effort, sentence after sentence, page after page, of subtle, strong, varied, precise, and stately English. Whatever he was writing—letters or sermons or philosophical treatises—he is always at the same high level. There seems no bound to the riches of his resources in this way. He could not express himself in a free and easy way. Every page he wrote, at least for the latter part of his life, was characteristic. Perhaps it is in his purely metaphysical arguments that his unlimited command of words shows itself most marvellously. Yet we are inclined to retract this, and to say that in such sermons as "Tides of the Spirit" he reaches his highest point. In such pieces he seems to surpass everyone, living and dead, in the wealth and surprise of his diction.

Martineau's style, Dr. Nicoll suggests, may have been derived originally from the Scottish philosophers. Was it not rather the natural expression of his own temperament, in which genius burned (as Dr. A. W. Jackson has pointed out) with a brilliance more nearly akin to his French ancestry? Mr. Upton clearly is of that opinion, for after quoting Dr. Jackson, he says:—

I should be inclined to go even further, and say in his carefulness to find a solid basis in psychological fact for all his metaphysical and ethical constructions, as well as in the artistic graces of his style, he presents more affinity with Cousin and Jouffroy than with any contemporary philosophical school of either Germany or Britain.

ONE other quotation we will allow ourselves from Dr. Nicoll's article. After further comments on Dr. Martineau's style, which suffered in his views from excess of elaboration, he proceeds:—

As a philosopher there can be no doubt at all of Martineau's almost unrivalled power. He grappled with his problems until he forced their solution. He grasped the salient facts with the utmost firmness. His thought was subtle, his criticism firm, and his power of exposition and illustration quite unrivalled. He had a most disinterested enthusiasm for the pure truth of philosophy, and, above all, he was a spiritual philosopher, the foremost of our time, perhaps the foremost of his century. Everything went back with him to the supreme idea of moral obligation. From this he deduced the human intellect as apprehending truth and not illusion. Whatever may be thought of his theology, in philosophy he was purely Christian. We cannot think that such a book as "Types of Ethical Theory" can easily be dethroned. It was the result of a lifetime's labour. His steady witness to theism and immortality in face of the vast difficulties raised by evolution was a signal service to the Church of Christ.

ONE of the most interesting of the reviews of the "Life" of Dr. Martineau which we have seen appeared in the Northern Whig of Nov. 1. Having spoken of the portraits of Dr. Martineau, included in the book, the review concludes as follows:—

"He was the last of the great Puritans, not in the narrow sense in which the word is often used, but as Milton was a Puritan. With his wide cultivation of mind, his delicate and discriminating taste for music and art, his gracious dignity of manner, there was combined a simplicity of life, a regularity of habit, and a pervading tone of moral severity, and of direct personal responsibility for every thought and word to the great Searcher of hearts. 'It is the penalty of greatness to lose the sympathy of meaner men,' says Principal Caird. There was in Dr. Martineau's genius an element of lonely detachment. He could never have been a popular leader. He had no eye for the timely compromises which are so necessary on the lower levels of life. But this gave him all the stronger power over the heart in its higher moods and its more pathetic needs. It would not be easy to find in the whole literature of consolation anything more searching and delicate in its sympathy than the letter written to a stricken friend, which is printed at the end of Volume I. of the biography. But nowhere is this combined strength and tenderness of his character more conspicuous than in the series of letters written to his friends after he had passed his ninetieth year. They are full of the old desire to know; there is no abatement of intellectual force; but they are pervaded by a lofty tranquillity as of one who is conscious already of living in another world. As a revelation of the soul of old age, they are probably unique in our literature."

IN the October number of the Humane Review (Ernest Bell, 6, York-street, Covent Garden, 1s.) will be found "A Plea for Manual Labour," by Mr. Herbert Rix, which we trust will be widely read. It was made originally as an address at the Croydon Ethical and Religious Fellowship, and is such as we should all be the better for pondering. The plea is really two-fold, first for physical exercise for the health of body and soul alike; and, secondly, for a general participation, so far as practicable, in manual labour, both for its own sake and to break down the class distinctions, which have set a stamp of inferiority on those who work with their hands.

MR. RIX quotes the saying of Aeschylus, "Sweat goes before virtue," and insists that no one is really healthy either in body or soul who never labours ad sudorem. And he adds:—

Tolstoy has noted the fact that the Turkish bath was invented by one of the laziest nations upon earth. With them it was a substitute for labour. That which they would not obtain by natural means they had to obtain by artificial means. And Tolstoy proposes to establish a new kind of cure, which he calls "Arbeitskur." We have our medicinal baths and our hydropathic establishments—why not have establishments for cure by labour? The labour-cure is a cure which the upper and middle classes have hitherto disregarded.

This is commended to all the self-indulgent of the upper and middle classes, and all who are sickly from their unnatural way of life—sickly from ennui, from self-introspection, from dyspepsia and hypochondria and various nervous complaints. Well for them, and for the whole tribe of clerks high and low, if they could find some means of practising the labour-cure, and happy for the world if its manual labour could be more equally distributed.

DISTINCTIONS there must always be, even in Utopia, and we can as yet go only a little way toward the more equal sharing of manual labour, which would be healthful for all alike. But as things are at present, Mr. Rix urges, much might be done, by a changed attitude towards manual labour, to take the sting out of what is too often felt as social injustice. There should never be any excuse in the manner or conduct of the well-to-do for the suspicion that they regard any honest labour as beneath their dignity, and they themselves, Mr. Rix thinks, would be all the better for an occasional sharing in what are looked upon as "menial" tasks.

One way to regain our sympathy with those who serve us, to realise their lives, and save ourselves from a luxurious discontent, is to share at times their work. It makes my blood boil sometimes to hear the supercilious way in which the well-dressed consumer speaks to the ill-dressed producer. In the street, and in the shop, and in the warehouse you may hear it, and you may hear it in the home. I sometimes wish there could be an Act of Parliament by which every mistress could be compelled to serve one week in the year in her own kitchen, every lady of fashion to serve as a dressmaker or behind a counter, every squire as a farm labourer, every dandy as a tailor, and so on all round. Meanwhile, we may without an Act of Parliament do something of that kind. We may share at times the labour of those who labour for us, try to enter into their difficulties, and to brighten their lives, and strive against the false shame which makes the menial task seem degrading. In this way we may manifest the spirit of Him who said "The Son of Man came not to be ministered unto but to minister."

AN interesting article on the Doukhobors, now settled in Canada, appeared in the Daily News of Nov. 7, giving impressions of their character, and an account of some of their institutions. The Doukhobor Catechism, it seems, contains sixty-eight questions, and the quality of their religious faith may be gathered from the following quotation of the first and last six of these:—

1. What kind of man art thou?—I am God's man.

2. How art thou God's man?—I am God's, because to Him I pray by fulfilling His commandments. From Him have I come, and unto Him do I aspire.

3. Out of what has God created thee?—Out of the earth He created the body, and with His immortal spirit has He vitalised it.

4. Wherefore has God created thee?—For the manifestation of His spirit on the earth; that the name of the Lord may be glorified; that we may attain the knowledge of the way of the Lord God, and walk in His house.

5. What is demanded of thee?—The accomplishment of righteous deeds—i.e., the fruit of truth.

6. What is that without which thou canst not come to God?—A pure conscience—right deeds.

63. Do you keep the bright Easter-day?—We do. Every day is a bright Easter-day.

64. Do you partake of Holy Communion?—We partake of the Holy Communion, when we fearlessly profess Christ before men, when we come into communion with Christ's Church, with God's family.

65. Do you commemorate Jesus Christ?—We do, when we sit at the same table with our betrayers and wash their feet, or in any other way serve our enemies as if they were our friends.

66. Do you fast?—We do. We regard that as fasting which separates man from the fetters of untruth. Take away complaining from the tongue, refrain from evil deeds—that is fasting. He fasts who does God's deeds, who fulfils the Truth, keeps the commandments.

67. What is purity of soul?—Purity of soul consists in being clean in body and in deed.

68. Who has taught you all this?—Our Master is God, our Teacher the Holy Ghost, and our only Shepherd Jesus the Saviour. Thy will be done, Lord, for ever and ever. Amen.

THE LIFE OF DR. MARTINEAU.*

THIRD NOTICE.

MR. UPTON'S survey of Dr. Martineau's Philosophical Work forms, as we have already stated, a separate and concluding section of the "Life and Letters," added to Dr. Drummond's biography. In nine chapters, occupying some 230 pages, Mr. Upton has furnished not only a most helpful account of Dr. Martineau's greater philosophical works, but an extremely interesting sketch of the progress of his thought, and an estimate of the significance of his teaching in regard to the great questions of religion.

The first chapter, on "The Hartleyan Period of Dr. Martineau's Philosophy," describes his training in early life in the Necessarian and Utilitarian doctrines of Hartley, which, largely through the influence of Priestley, were at that time prevalent in Unitarian circles. The teaching Martineau received at Manchester College was confirmed by the writings of James Mill, and by the relations of sympathy and friendship into which he was drawn with John Stuart Mill. In 1834 he still wrote as an adherent of that school, as may be seen from the article on "Bentham's Deontology" which he contributed to the Monthly Repository of that year.† But he had long been restive under the constraint of the Necessarian doctrine of the will; even while he was at college it seems to have been chiefly his sister's more decided conviction which silenced his scruples, and during the early years of his ministry the experience, both of the pulpit and of class teaching, led to a more searching examination of the grounds of moral conviction, and to a final abandonment of the doctrines in which he had been trained. In 1839 his conversion was complete, and when Channing received a copy of the lecture on "The Christian View of Moral Evil," delivered in the course of the Liverpool Unitarian controversy of that year, he at once wrote with cordial pleasure, welcoming Martineau's protest against the doctrine of philosophical necessity. That doctrine, and its natural connections, he said, he had long felt to be "a millstone round the neck of Unitarianism in England." "I have always lamented that Dr. Priestley's authority has fastened this doctrine on his followers."

What the change meant to Martineau himself he described in the Biographical Memoranda. It involved, indeed, the rewriting of all his lectures; but he adds:—

> For all this, however, there was ample compensation in the sense of inward deliverance which I seemed to gain from artificial system into natural speech. It was an escape from a logical cage into the open air. I breathed more freely. The horizon enlarged, I could mingle with the world and believe in what I saw and felt without refracting it through a glass, which construed it into something else. I could use the language of men—of their love and hate, of remorse and resolve, of repentance and prayer—in its simplicity without any "subauditur" which neutralises its sense.

In the following year, 1840, Martineau became, at the age of thirty-five, a professor in Manchester College, and from that time remained steadfast to the fundamental principles of his teaching, as the eloquent exponent and champion of an Ethical Theism, based upon moral intuitions and the reality of human responsibility and man's capacity for a true knowledge of God.

How much Martineau owed to the year's study in Germany (1848-49) he has partly told in the preface to his "Types of Ethical Theory," and Mr. Upton dwells more fully upon this, while noting that it is a mistake (as in the "Dictionary of National Biography") to refer his abandonment of the Necessarian doctrine to the German period. That conversion had already been effected ten years before. In Berlin Martineau studied chiefly Plato and Hegel, and there is a passage quoted from a letter to Mr. Thom, giving his impressions of the philosophical teaching prevalent in Germany, as having lost all hold on the realities of the moral life and given over to an ineffective Pantheism. On this Mr. Upton remarks that Dr. Martineau would have taken a more hopeful view of the situation if he had known at that time that Lotze had already begun to lecture at Göttingen, for in the fundamental principles of his system, as in Martineau's, Mr. Upton sees the best hope for the future of a sound philosophy of religion. To one special point bearing on this German experience, Mr. Upton refers in a later chapter on the "Study of Spinoza":—

> For nothing, I feel assured, will posterity be more grateful to Dr. Martineau than for the lucidity and force with which he has shown that the facts of our ethical and religious experience imply and demand that the voluntary nature of man must be saved from Pantheistic absorption, and be left standing as, within its sphere, a free cause other than the divine yet homogeneous with it.

Mr. Upton tells in the Preface to his "Survey" of the exceptional opportunities he had through a long course of years of discussing in personal converse with Dr. Martineau every aspect of his philosophical teaching, and a feature of special value in this book is the criticism which he offers in more than one place on matters of great importance. Thus Mr. Upton agrees that critics have found vulnerable points in Dr. Martineau's ethical theory, while, nevertheless, "the permanent truths are the essential elements in his ethical and religious doctrine, and if the questionable factors are modified or removed, the foundations of his philosophy as a bulwark of rational Theism remain substantially unshaken."

And again, as to Dr. Martineau's doctrine of the knowledge of God, Mr. Upton points out that there were two elements of his teaching, which are not formally harmonised.

> That Dr. Martineau really believed that we do know God in his reality is evident from countless passages in his writings; but I must confess that I feel great difficulty in understanding how we could possibly reach this knowledge if he were differenced from our subjective selves in the same way as "other objects of thought" are.

That is a reference to a passage in Martineau's essay on "Sir William Hamilton's Philosophy," and Mr. Upton proceeds to argue, as he has already done in an earlier chapter (lecture in text and note, p. 357, is a misprint), that there is a more essential union between God and Man, than such a mode of thought would allow. And he proceeds:—

> My excuse for again referring to it is, that Dr. Martineau in many of his profoundest and most beautiful passages, as, for instance, when he says that "No merely finite being can possibly believe the Infinite," appears to be practically recognising the existence in man of an immediate apprehension of God which is quite different from the relative mode in which we came to know "other objects of thought." Whether this direct apprehension of God can be strictly called "knowledge" depends upon how we define "knowledge"; but if I rightly interpret Dr. Martineau's writings, he certainly assumed that in that Divine revelation which is made in us through the universal principles of thought, and through the Divinely authoritative ideals of Beauty, Righteousness, and Love, we have a genuine, though very imperfect, insight into the absolute reality of God.

In the concluding chapter, on "Appreciations and Criticisms," Mr. Upton returns to this subject, showing how there are present in Dr. Martineau's writings two modes of conceiving God, one which represents God as "another and higher Person," and the other as "the Soul of Souls." The former conception is found in Dr. Martineau's formal teaching, but the latter, Mr. Upton insists, and by quotation clearly shows, was at the root of many of Martineau's deepest and most spiritual utterances. That Mr. Hutton also recognised the mystical side of Dr. Martineau's thought is seen from the following passage in the Spectator's memorial article (Jan. 27, 1900):—

> We doubt whether the historian of the English thought of our time will credit Martineau with any distinct modification of the theological or philosophical opinions of this age. It was something that went below opinion; it was a revelation of spiritual character and power. That was the impressive thing in James Martineau. Holding this view, we should, perhaps, appraise differently from some the value of his writings. Important as are such of his later works as the "Types of Ethical Theory" or the "Seat of Authority in Religion," we have no hesitation in saying that in his wonderful sermons known collectively as "Hours of Thought on Sacred Things," and in his "Endeavours after the Christian Life," the real Martineau, the spiritual teacher who will endure, has accomplished his greatest and finest work. . . . Spirit speaks to spirit in these pages, which are worthy of the finest mysticism of the Catholic Church at her best, while at the same time manly, healthy, in harmony with human reason, and couched in a singularly noble and remarkable prose style.

If, on the other hand, Mr. Stopford Brooke thought that Martineau was deficient in "the deep emotions of the mystic," Mr. Upton puts that down to the prominence of those elements in his intellectual and ethical philosophy, which seem to be at variance with the deep spirituality of his nature. Of the ethical side of Martineau's teaching Mr. Upton writes as follows:—

> No one has shown more lucidly than he has that in all our ideals there is revealed

* "The Life and Letters of James Martineau." By James Drummond, M.A., LL.D., Litt.D., Principal of Manchester College, Oxford; and C. B. Upton, B.A., B.Sc., Professor of Philosophy in Manchester College, Oxford. In two volumes. London: James Nisbet and Co. 30s. net.

† Mr. Upton clearly shows that Martineau's article on that work was the one above mentioned, and that the series of articles in the Christian Reformer of 1835 on the same subject must have been by another hand. Through a lapse of memory Dr. Martineau seems to have spoken of his own article as in the Christian Reformer, and the mistake is repeated by Mr. Jackson and in the "Dictionary of National Biography."

a Divine Presence which, though felt in us, is also felt to be not of us, so that we can clearly distinguish between this self-revelation of the immanent God, which carries with it the sense of an objective reality, and those subjective desires, affections and sympathies which pertain to us as separate individuals. But though the Divine Ideal is ever more or less vividly present in our consciousness, and is that which gives to our life all its highest features, and all its truest charms and blessedness, yet it first distinctly reveals itself and its authority when it resists and condemns our personal desires and aims. Now it is this aspect of the Ideal as opposing us, commanding us, obliging us which is the characteristic feature of our ethical consciousness; and it is this experience which is a continual warning to us against falling into the paralysing fallacy of supposing that our lives are nothing more than transient modes or phases of God's eternal life. Here it is we learn our true individuality, and learn also, what Kant so clearly saw, the quite infinite value of a "Good Will." It is evident, I think, that what mainly constitutes the incalculable worth of Dr. Martineau's writings, and renders them so seasonable and needful at the present time, is the emphasis with which he insists on, and the clearness with which he expounds, this essential truth in man's relationship with God. It is this which will make his philosophy live when the popular pantheisms which now captivate so many minds shall have had their day and ceased to be; for this truth rests on the daily deliverance of our moral consciousness; it is the truth to which Judaism, through the mouth of its greatest prophets and singers, has borne and will bear immortal testimony.

Yet that, Mr. Upton points out, is not all. God is revealed, not only in the stern voice of Conscience, "but also in the apprehension of the Beautiful and in the sentiments of spiritual Love, in which man most deeply feels his intimate communion with God, and his fundamental spiritual unity with all his fellow-men." And if these more mystical elements of the religious life do not find adequate expression in Dr. Martineau's formal philosophical teaching, they yet constantly recur in his writings, in passages of most beautiful and profoundest religious inspiration.

We must now leave this very inadequate account of Mr. Upton's work, in the hope that it has at least shown how great is the value of his "Survey of Dr. Martineau's Philosophical Work," and how helpful a guide he, who speaks of himself as "a life-long and devoted disciple," will prove in a study of the works of his great Teacher.

We will conclude this notice by quoting a passage from Dr. Caldecott's "Philosophy of Religion in England and America," with which Mr. Upton also ends his work. In the complete passage Dr. Caldecott has spoken of Martineau as "one of the great Masters" in the philosophy of religion, whose doctrine of Causality and of Conscience is of the highest value. And he concludes:—

> Lastly, his insistence on the personal nature of religious conviction, with the self-evidence and self-disclosure which are involved in it, and the necessity of substituting a Religion of Consciousness for the Religion of Custom—to use an early phrase of his own—though pressed to exaggeration and consequent defect in other directions, brings into relief one aspect of religious faith which can never for a moment be obscured without pernicious consequences to itself. If to these excellences we add the extraordinary profusion of delicate analyses of experience, of expressions of original thought and profound personal feeling, given to us in nervous, lucid, and most richly varied English, we can see that Martineau has secured one of the places of highest honour in the literature of our English Theism, and has given us many thoughts of the kind which raise the whole level of man's religious meditations.

IN TUSCANY.*

WELCOME is any book in these grey November days that breathes the magic of such a title. A glance at it in the confusing wealth of the bookseller's window is enough to carry one away to the white cities of the South. Forgotten are the noises of the busy street, the hurry of London's sleepless life, even that eternal pillar of cloud—her murky fog. In a flash we see the pure duomos and campaniles; the silent galleries of matchless art, those palaces wherein the painters now are the princes; the narrow streets where life is so much lived in the open, and even the beggar seems contented; and, in the background of it all, the dim blue mountains shielding the wide valleys of olive and of vine.

This is the miracle of the title-page. Will it hold good when the pages are cut? Can any writer hope to preserve an atmosphere so subtle with reminiscence and fancy as Italy is to the Englishman? Certainly to write of such a land is to court sure failure unless a living knowledge and a warm affection move the writer. Both these qualities have fortunately stood by Mr. Carmichael as he wrote "In Tuscany," whence probably it comes about that he achieves that rare success in topography—a second edition. That he has well and carefully learned the country round about his present home he shows by the freedom with which he paints the leading traits of certain folk and towns of Tuscany; and only a true affection for the native people could have drawn the two fine pieces of (probably) imaginative work—the sketches of Fra Pacifico and the Very Rev. Canon Domenico Pucci. In each of these two outlines we have a tender handling of the simple religious life, a picture of primitive holiness and utter unworldliness, that could only have been described by one who had penetrated to the intimate knowledge of typical characters because he loved them.

This, too, is the feeling that Mr. Carmichael evokes when he writes of his visit to La Verna. As a pilgrimage to a sacred spot associated with St. Francis, it is no unworthy companion-picture to Symonds' sensitive sketch of his Easter morning visit to the shrine of the saint at Assisi. Told, as we might expect a Catholic to tell it, with reverence and faith, we have first the story of that marvellous bestowal of the stigmata, and of St. Francis' pathetic farewell to La Verna, and then the account of a visit by the writer one September.

It so fell out that the 17th was a Sunday, and the toilers of the countryside were free to come in numbers. Hundreds of peasants had already poured in. Every square inch of sleeping room had long since been allotted. We rose at midnight for Matins. The weather had changed. A mountain storm was raging in full fury. What a spectacle the church presented! On the benches, in the confessionals, underneath the altars, on the altar steps, lay the recumbent figures of a hundred or two peasants who had found no other place to rest their heads. Great green ginghams were stretched out to dry; dogs slept by their masters' side; nearly every man had his bundle of provisions. Verily these Tuscan peasants are at home in their Father's house.

A nature sympathetic to its subject could alone have seen and described—especially in the feeling of that last sentence — this gathering of rough countrymen. Nor could any other spirit have prompted the visitors to write in the monastry book: "N. N. were the guests of the Franciscan Fathers here from the——to the——and departed from this dwelling place of the Poor Ones of Christ richer men than when they came."

Undoubtedly, then, in the two qualities of knowledge and sympathy the reader will find himself to be in good hands, and he may take up this book with a certainty of passing a pleasant and restful time in the company of one who knows his ground. He will not be walked over all the well-known spots. That is a piece of work which Mr. Carmichael might well do in the future. But for the present there are studies in Tuscan manners and people, sketches of the ordinary working (and non-working) folks of the country, a rather full and very interesting account of the national gambling habit, the State Lottery; and, more interesting to some, there are pleasant visits to the lesser known towns, and some of the famous monasteries. Leghorn, which hardly anyone seems to speak of enthusiastically, is found to have many charms about her —so many indeed that one at last sees why she should be called Livorno la Cara. Volterra, hardly even a name to many, becomes strangely attractive when one finds that one could enter the town by a gateway 4,000 years old, that here one could see that alabaster industry still active which was flourishing 2,000 years before the Christian era, and that from Volterra came St. Linus, "the immediate successor of St. Peter."

Of Pisa, who can say anything new? Is not her Campo Santo queen of the fields of death? Is any monument so known as the Leaning Tower? And who could miss the crowd of classic figures on Pisano's pulpit? But the author of "In Tuscany" leads us about this palaced city of the Lower Arno as one well versed in her hidden treasures, bids us listen to that echo in the baptistry by which the human voice returns from the dome with a harmony and sweetness unknown to any man-built organ; takes us to the Church of Santa Maria della Spina, that "choicest of all Gothic gems"; interests us in the great sacred picture of the Duomo; drives out with us to the Royal Park, where for 150 years a large herd of camels have thriven; and, in the end, takes us to the Porto Pisano, whence came those historic chains that bind the imagination as one gazes upon them in the Campo Santo — chains taken by Genoa in 1362, and restored in 1860, accompanied by one of the noblest messages of unity ever sent from city to city.

So one puts down this book with a surety of taking it up again and again whenever one would be reminded by excellent illustration and sympathetic writ-

ETHICAL SCRIPTURES.*

THE re-issue of Dr. Stanton Coit's collection of "Ethical Scriptures" would seem to indicate that his care and diligence in preparing the book have met with appreciation. The new edition is aptly adorned with a copy of Watts's picture, "The Dweller in the Innermost," the symbolical force of which will be readily perceived. The compiler's aim has been to do something for modern readers analogous to that which, as he says, was obviously done in the production of the De Imitatione Christi, that is, not to issue an argumentative treatise, or even a book of original meditations, but to present a series of memorable utterances gathered from many sources and fused into a whole by the selective skill and sympathy of one meditative mind. How far he has been successful in so commendable an effort will be estimated differently by different minds. To the present writer the book has been familiar since its first appearance, and its rich store of wise thoughts has often been tested and found most useful and stimulating. In a series of progressive chapters the compiler leads us from the root-ideas of personal duty up to regions of social and national morals; and, before he closes, indicates the measure of confidence we may feel as to the significance of life, notwithstanding its apparently ephemeral character. It is a strenuous and lofty spirit that meets us on these pages, and everyone should be grateful for the opportunity of such high intercourse as they afford.

While commending the book to others who may not yet have noticed it or welcomed it as it deserves, it must be confessed that the method of stringing together quotations from different writers, so as to make a continuous chapter on any subject, is exposed to several dangers, and it cannot be said that Dr. Coit's work wholly escapes them. His selections are made, of course, from ancients and moderns, and their inevitable varieties of diction and temperament betray the process, and give one a disturbing sense of patchwork. In the case of the Imitation few, if any, can recall the original author of any particular saying there embodied, except in cases where Biblical quotations are made. In reading the work under consideration everyone must pay the penalty of what knowledge he possesses, and the more familiar he is with good literature the more certainly he will be diverted now and again from the thought expressed to the remembrance of the author. In the new edition, in spite of Dr. Coit's evident desire to escape from this kind of personal intervention, the references to works cited have been brought from the end of the book to accompany the text at the foot of the page. The effect will be easily understood. The eye is continually being drawn downwards to see who said this or that, and memory is not allowed to enjoy the benefits of a temporary lapse.

The compiler's care in dealing with the passages quoted cannot be too highly praised; he scrupulously indicates where abridgment has taken place or phrases have been altered. The verification of references has been carried out very diligently, though there are still some few sentences to be traced to their original source. The chief ground of difference between Dr. Coit and his critics is probably to be found in the matter of the revision exercised by him in order to bring the sayings of devout worshippers of God into line with "ethical" usage. The letters "t.o." appear frequently when such writers are quoted, and indicate "theological phrase or word omitted." The compiler thinks the sense of the passage "is not thereby impaired." For him, probably not; but we should like to hear what Fénélon, Baxter, Martineau, Channing and others so dealt with would have to say on that point. To me the difference between the passage with "t.o." and without seems at times like that between a statue and a living face.

SALUTARY THOUGHTS.—I.

AMONG the valuable contents of the "Essex Hall Year Book," which is now undergoing its annual revision, are some model rules for congregations. These are excellent as far as they go, but there are many points on which they fail to supply useful information. Some of these deficiencies we hope to be able to remedy.

For instance, congregations would often like to know how to keep their minister in his place, and a good rule for this purpose will meet with general acceptance. The fundamental principle is obviously laid down by St. Paul when he warns every man not to think more highly of himself than he ought to think, and a congregation are only following an apostolic precept when they endeavour to apply this principle to their minister. They must, therefore, be very careful how they ever praise anything he does, either his sermons or his teaching, his visiting or any other practical work he undertakes. Sometimes praise cannot be altogether avoided; but, when given, it should invariably be accompanied by a little condescending patronage, a tone implying, "This was really good for you." This will impart a certain tepidity to the whole communication, and as something neither hot nor cold it may safely be trusted not to do much harm. As is well known, there was once a prayer-meeting at which a deacon prayed that the Lord would keep their minister poor and humble. A second deacon followed this up by praying, "O Lord, we will keep him poor if Thou wilt keep him humble." It remains for our modern congregation still further to undertake the responsibility of keeping their minister humble as well as poor, and this may be done without incurring any special obligation to heaven by calling sufficient attention to his various weak points. The best of ministers have plenty; one minister is known to have declared that he positively bristled with them; and considerable pleasure may be derived from watching for them, hunting them out, and bringing them forward into the clear light of day. The minister himself will be far too apt to imagine that his people should take the benefit of the good he can give them without dwelling on the defects allotted to him by nature and not remedied by grace. Obviously it is for the congregation to redress the balance by insisting that the particular things they need are just those which he fails to give them.

After acquiring sufficient practice in this method of dealing with the minister, the congregation will find little difficulty in applying it to one another among their own members. The effect of it on an organist, on a Sunday-school superintendent, or the secretary to a committee, may be very marked indeed, and may lead to results greater and more permanent than would at first be supposed possible. But it is well to begin with the minister, as the natural leader of the congregation, especially if he is dependent on his salary for his livelihood. His success or failure, in every sense, is to be estimated by the spiritual benefits which he confers upon his people. It must be their fault if they let him suppose that he has done for them more than he really has.

A story told at one of our public conferences illustrates a truly judicious method of procedure. A minister related how he had been holding a Communion service, having been assisted in the administration by one of his leading laymen. After the service the two walked away together, the minister in an unduly exalted frame of mind. The first words of the laymen brought him down to earth. "How much do you think I weigh?" he asked. In a moment the thing was done effectually, and let us add, most delicately.

Attention to details should not be forgotten, and one detail of great moment is the impression which may be produced through his wife, if the minister is a married man. This is part of a far-reaching principle of action. When you cannot hit a man himself you can often produce a deeper effect by hitting someone for whom he greatly cares. Another point is worth noting. When you cannot say something to a man himself, and know it would be good for him to hear it, you can often say it to someone who will be sure to repeat it to him; and it is here that ministers' wives are invaluable. Much may be done by simply damning with faint praise. Such a speech as "Poor little man; he does his best," does not deserve to be buried in the mind of a wifely recipient, and perhaps to die there forgotten. Still less does it deserve to become a household joke among those whose nature is too sturdy to allow small grievances to rankle. Mishaps of this kind may occur, but on the whole it may be said that here as ever perseverance will be rewarded.

This subject gradually passes into another—namely, ministers' wives, and what is expected of them. A second paper by another hand will, we trust, adequately deal with this very important question.

OBITUARY.

THE REV. D. L. EVANS.

THE Rev. David Lewis Evans, whose death at Aberystwyth on Oct. 29, in his ninetieth year, we recorded last week, was a native of Cardiganshire, having been born in the parish of Llanwenog, in July, 1813. He was thus at the time of his death the oldest surviving minister on the roll of our churches. His parents were members of the Unitarian congregation at Alltyplaca Chapel, his father having the charge of a neighbouring quarry, and the boy's first schooling was of a very primitive sort; but with perseverance he made his way, and as a young man himself engaged in teaching. In 1834 he entered Carmarthen College, and on the completion of his course, after a short stay at Onen Fawr, near Llandilo, became in 1839 minister of the Presbyterian congregations of Bloxham and Milton, in Oxfordshire. Four years later, however, he returned to his own country, as assistant to the Rev. J. E. Jones, of Bridgend, in his academy, with occasional pulpit services. His help was also given to the Welsh monthly Yr Ymofynydd, from its foundation in 1847, as assistant and afterwards for a few years as chief editor, until the end of 1872, when he was succeeded by the Rev. R. J. Jones, of Aberdare. After seven years at Bridgend, Mr. Evans removed to Colyton, taking some of his pupils with him, and entered on a happy ministry of thirteen years in Devonshire. There, in 1856, he married the eldest daughter of Captain George Eyre Powell, R.N. In 1863 Mr. Evans was called to Carmarthen as professor of Hebrew and Mathematics in the Presbyterian College, adding to the laborious duties of his professorship a considerable amount of preaching. On his retirement in 1874, he settled for a time at Birkenhead, where one of his sons was entering on business, and then it was that he lectured at a number of places in North Wales, on behalf of the B. and F.U.A. Latterly he made his home again in his native country. Professor Evans was a student to the end, being specially devoted to the Hebrew Scriptures. In later life his sympathies were strongly drawn to the Christadelphians. Only last summer he had the pleasure of being present once more at the public examinations at Carmarthen College, and received a warm welcome from old pupils, of whom the present Principal of the College is one. The long life was peacefully ended, and in the presence of many friends, on Saturday week, the last office was performed by the Rev. John Davies in the burial-ground of the Alltyplaca Chapel.

THE REV. FRANCIS REVITT.

THE death, on Nov. 7, of the Rev. Francis Revitt, of Lincoln, removes one who since 1875 had occupied the pulpit of the old High-street Chapel under circumstances far from encouraging to healthy congregational life. Mr. Revitt was a native of Stannington, and received his impulse towards the ministry from the Rev. Brooke Herford in his Sheffield days. After a period of service as lay-preacher, Mr. Revitt became a student of the Home Missionary Board in Manchester, and in 1867 began his ministry at Mottram and Stalybridge. Ill-health led to his retirement and an interval of five years spent in his native village, after which he entered on his charge at Lincoln. That he gained there the respect and sympathy of many friends was proved by the large attendance at his funeral, at which the service was conducted by the Revs. J. K. Smith, of Belper, and W. W. Robinson, of Gainsborough.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

The Story of St. Cuthbert.

IN the Autumn Exhibition of Pictures in Liverpool, there is a curious picture illustrating the Legend of the Founding of Durham Cathedral. Like almost all legends, it has a foundation of truth, but mixed up with the truth a great deal of what was pure imagination.

The story runs that about 200 years after the death of St. Cuthbert the monks at Lindisfarne, on the coast of Northumberland, near where the Saint was buried, were obliged to fly from their monastery to escape from the Danes, and the memory of St. Cuthbert was held by them in such reverence that they could not bear to leave his coffin behind for the Danes to take possession of, so they took it away with them, and carried it about, as they took refuge, first in one place and then in another. It remained at Chester for about 100 years, and then, after more perils and wanderings, it was for a time at Ripon. Then the monks were disturbed again, and had again to fly, taking the coffin with them, and they finally settled at Durham, where the coffin still is, in a great tomb behind the High Altar of the Cathedral. The legendary part of the story is in connection with their last journey, just before they settled at Durham. It is said that at Wredelaw the coffin refused to move until St. Cuthbert, in a vision, told his followers that he must rest at Durham, and a milkmaid, in search of her cow, led them to the place where they found a resting-place for the body of the Saint, and on that spot the beautiful Cathedral of Durham was afterwards built.

In the foreground of the picture stand a group of monks round the coffin on its rude stand, with thick, clumsy wheels. Bishop Aldune, who is leading them, stands at the head of the coffin, over which hangs, in mid-air, the curious vision which the little company are supposed to see—a very stiff, conventional representation of the monk, in gold, the figure being transparent, so that there are visible through it the Bishop and one of the monks, and part of the rough ploughed field across which they are taking the coffin, while in the background are seen a man ploughing, and the milkmaid who is presently to be their guide. The difficulty of carrying about the coffin in the rough state in which the country then was must have been enormous, but in their devotion to the memory of the Saint the men were undaunted by any such difficulties, and the whole incident is an illustration of the power of a good life and the influence that such a life cannot help exerting on those who come after, as well as on those around.

Cuthbert was born about the year 637, and his early life was passed at the foot of the Lammermoor Hills in Scotland. When he was fifteen he went to join the monks at Melrose, in what was then known as the Kingdom of Northumbria, but there was at that time no beautiful Abbey, such as was built in after years, the ruins of which are still standing. The monks of that time had only log huts to live in, and the boy Cuthbert lived with them and joined in their work. About ten or twelve years later the Prior died, and, young as he was, Cuthbert was chosen by the monks to fill his place, and it was then that his missionary journeys began, up and down, and right across the country from the Solway to the Forth. A few years later there were changes in some of the monasteries, and Cuthbert, who was not yet thirty, was made Prior of Lindisfarne, a very important monastery on the coast of Northumberland, where he stayed for twelve years. Then, for eight years after that, he lived a very curious life. Miles away out at sea, beyond the Island of Lindisfarne, or Holy Isle, was another smaller island called Farne, a barren, desolate place, which was shunned by the country people, who believed that there were demons on it. St. Cuthbert went to live on this island, so that he might more completely spend his life in prayer and meditation. He must have been intensely uncomfortable there, for he lived in a small cave hollowed out of the rock, and his only protection from the weather was the hide of an ox, hung before the entrance to the cave, while his food consisted almost entirely of barley, which he grew on the island. But though he lived alone, he was ready to see anyone who wanted his advice, and people came from far and near to tell him their troubles and difficulties, and he helped them all. Then, at last, one day, the King of Northumbria came to him, and begged him to leave his retreat on the Island of Farne, and take up his old work again in the world where good men were so much needed. He consented, and then began a busy responsible life for him, for he was made Bishop of Lindisfarne, and had under his care a large district spreading far to the west, and including Carlisle and all the surrounding monasteries. But he still remained the same simple, earnest, devoted man, giving up all his time to doing good, so that he was loved and respected wherever he went.

A few months before his death, which took place when he was about fifty, he retired again to the Island of Farne for rest. By his own wish he was buried on the island, and the spot came to be considered sacred, so that sick people were carried there to be healed of their diseases; till at last, 200 years later, when the Danes invaded that part of the country, and the monks had to fly, they took the coffin with them rather than let it fall into the hands of the Danes.

St. Cuthbert's good influence lived long after he himself died, and extended far and wide over lands where he himself had never been. The secret of his good influence was that he built up a noble character by trying always to think right thoughts. He realised that "what we are is the result of all that we have thought; it is founded on our thoughts, it is made up of our thoughts."

Do good in Thought, some future day
'Twill ripen into Speech,
And words are seeds which grow to deeds,
None know how far they reach.

LONDON, NOVEMBER 15, 1902.

THE AMENDED BILL AND RELIGIOUS QUESTIONS.

THE portions of the Education Bill which have already passed the Committee stage in the House of Commons contain the significant enactments dealing with matters of religious instruction. It may be useful therefore, at this point, to sum them up—all the more so as the Government finds itself at present between two opposite fires with regard to this subject. Notwithstanding Mr. BALFOUR'S assurances that the Bill creates no grievance for Nonconformists, but rather takes away former disabilities, the Free Churchmen are showing unabated hostility to his Bill. On the other hand, the Bishops, headed by the Bishops of WORCESTER and LONDON, and aided by High Churchman like Lord HALIFAX, declare that the Bill, as recently amended, violates a cardinal principle, and that it must be put right before they can accept it. An examination of the clauses actually passed will show what grounds exist for these respective positions.

The pertinent matter stands chiefly in Parts II. and III. of the Bill, though some important considerations should arise also in connection with Part IV. Part I. simply enacts that local councils shall be the local educational authorities. Part II. (in a grossly inadequate fashion) deals with "Higher Education," and the first reference to the religious difficulty arises in Clause 4, which now reads as follows :—

(1.) A council, in the application of money under this Part of this Act, shall not require that any particular form of religious instruction or worship, or any religious catechism or formulary which is distinctive of any particular denomination, shall or shall not be taught, used or practised in any school or college aided but not provided by the council,

And no pupil shall be excluded from or placed in an inferior position in any school, or college, or hostel provided by the council on the ground of religious belief,

And no catechism or formulary distinctive of any particular religious denomination shall be taught or used in any school, college, or hostel so provided.

(2.) In a school or college receiving a grant from, or maintained by, a council under this Part of the Act,

(a.) a scholar attending as a day or evening scholar shall not be required, as a condition of being admitted into or remaining in the school or college, to attend or abstain from attending any Sunday-school, place of religious worship, religious observance, or instruction in religious subjects in the school or college or elsewhere ; and

(b.) the times for religious worship or for any lesson on a religious subject shall be conveniently arranged for the purpose of allowing the withdrawal of any such scholar therefrom.

The force of this lengthy clause is not very difficult to discern. In the first place it prevents all action by the council in respect of religious questions in any school or college which it only "aids" by grant, but does not wholly "provide" ; but it affords a guarantee that in the "provided" higher schools no pupil shall suffer disability on account of religious belief, and that they shall be conducted, in brief, on unsectarian lines. Apparently it is no concern of the contemplated law if a pupil is placed in an inferior position in, or is excluded from, a college which is not wholly provided by the council, and in Section (2) there is no protection afforded to an inmate of either "aided" or "provided" school in respect of the hardships from which it shields the day scholar.

We come next to the consideration of elementary schools. The first point to be noticed in Part III. is that the local education authority is to have "control of all secular instruction in public elementary schools," whether "provided" or not. But this "control" by the council is limited by the conditions imposed in Clause 7, which enacts that as to "provided" schools the "minor local authority" (e.g., a parish council) may appoint two out of six managers. In schools "not provided" by the local education authority, the board of managers shall be, as to one-third of their number, representative of local authorities, and as to two-thirds, they shall be "foundation managers." Under Clause 8 the control of secular instruction by the local education authority in schools "not provided" by it is emphasised as a condition necessary to secure aid from that authority; yet again this control is limited by provisions as to the appointment of teachers—obviously a critical matter. Thus, the local education authority is to give directions as to the number and educational qualifications of teachers employed in giving secular instruction. Its consent is required to the dismissal of any teacher "unless the dismissal be on grounds connected with the giving of religious instruction in the school." But while the board of managers (two-thirds being "foundation" managers, non-representative of the ratepayers) are thus to have the power unchecked of selecting teachers of special religious belief, it is provided that assistants and pupil-teachers may be selected (of course by the managers) "without reference to religious creed or denomination." The implication is that the head-teachers may not be non-members of the denomination of the particular denominational school.

What has proved to be a very important stipulation has been added to Section (2) of Clause 8, and from the name of its proposer it has come to be known as "the Kenyon-Slaney amendment." It arose in connection with the question of differences that might occur between the local education authority and the managers of a school, and as it contains the first specific statement on the subject of religious instruction in this part of the Bill we quote it in full :—

> Religious instruction shall be given in a school not provided by the local education authority, in accordance with the tenour of the provisions (if any) of the trust deed relating thereto, and shall be under the control of the managers.

That Mr. BALFOUR should accept this amendment was only to be expected, as it exactly accords with his oft-declared aim of "preserving the denominational character of the denominational schools." The citizen's objection to it is based, of course, not on aversion to its fidelity to trusts, but on the over-ruling principle that so large a contribution of public money as is contemplated should be accompanied by a proportionate degree of real and adequate public control. But Mr. BALFOUR'S High Church friends, who were formerly hoping great things from his Bill, denounce this simple provision as to the trust-deeds as revolutionary and fatal. It actually leaves to a board of managers (whether foundation managers, clerical or lay, or local representatives) the right and duty of "controlling" religious instruction according to what may be deemed, by them or by the department's officials, to be the spirit of the trust-deed ! Bishop GORE thinks this is pernicious, being flatly contradictory of episcopal authority, as no doubt it is, in so far as it removes the control of religious instruction from the sole hands of the episcopally consecrated clergyman. We shall see whether the great bulk of Conservative and Unionist members who are supporting the Bill really desire to strengthen the hands of the Bishops in this matter.

Such are the chief provisions of the Bill in regard to religion. Into the minuter points of policy which may be traced in subsequent clauses we need not enter here. They are all toned into agreement with the cardinal aim of the Bill—namely, to "preserve the denominational character of the denominational schools" ; and, so largely has this idea predominated in the mind of the framers of the Bill, that while it is definitely provided, as we have seen, that the Higher Education provided by the local authority is to be free from denominational tests, there is not a single line specifically prohibiting such tests in connection with the public elementary schools provided by the local education authority. We are left to presume that this is covered by the statement in Clause 6 that "the local education authority" shall have "the powers and duties of a School Board" "under the Elementary Education Acts, 1870 to 1900." If the Bill had been considered principally as a national educational measure, and not as means for saving denominational schools from extinction, we should certainly have had such fundamental principles of former legislation emphatically reaffirmed.

But the minor defects and vices of this bad Bill it would be fruitless to discuss. It may be forced into law, but even Sir WILLIAM ANSON, who thinks apparently that the fears of experts like Dr. MACNAMARA and other educationists are all but groundless, must occasionally feel a little less optimistic in the contemplation of the turmoil that will surely follow. From our own point of view the action of the Government appears most deplorable, because it is so clearly shaped by sectional preferences. Instead of considering first and foremost, and all the time, what scheme will best secure the hearty and loyal co-operation of Englishmen in general, irrespective of creed and party, in the paramount work of training the minds of the younger generation; instead of bravely making an appeal to the nation earnestly, and even solemnly, to confer on this supremely important topic—the Government has snatched at an advantage arising out of a peculiar state of party politics, and is using it to fortify, as well as it is able, the forces of the sect which is called "the Church of England." We are convinced that thousands of members of that Church are with us in deploring the misuse being made of this occasion; still more surely we believe that the great bulk of thoughtful people sincerely regret a policy which, by its gross injustice and flagrant defiance of popular self-government, threatens to bring about an era of sectarian bitterness, wasteful party-strife, and chaotic inefficiency.

The Dean of Ripon has published a letter repudiating the Times report of his address on "Natural Christianity," and giving some indication of his attitude in regard to miracles, and the Incarnation and Resurrection, but surely his only course now, in face of the controversy that has arisen, is to publish his paper in full, as it was delivered. The outcry will then certainly not be abated, but reasonable men will be able to judge fairly both of his position, and the position of those who, like the Bishop of London, claim to speak for "The Church."

A MANUSCRIPT LIFE OF CHRIST OF ABOUT A.D. 1425.

THIS is a fragment of 51 leaves in English clearly written, with a perfection of alignment not the less creditable though not unusual in the penmanship of its period. Time and unknown vicissitudes have resulted in some discolouration of parchment which makes a few passages difficult of decipherment, and it is not always possible to get intelligible renderings of passages not otherwise obscured. But on the whole, as MSS. go, this one is very legible, and more patience than skill is necessary to its elucidation.

Of such patience it is indeed well worthy. As a life of Christ it can pretend to no "sources" but such as are freely drawn upon by other biographers—the Gospel narratives, a few traditions, and some fancy. But it is not for any light it may throw upon the "life of lives" that the MS. deserves to be studied. It is for its revelation of its author's personality; and of the religious conceptions of his period which determine and give colour to his presentment.

About these there is rare charm; and much of that interest which we speak of as emphatically human. There is nothing in any modern Life of Christ to compare with it. Mediæval Lives of the Saints cannot be classed in the same category. The author is unknown to us even by name; but as we ponder this loving and sympathetic portraiture of his Master, we seem to be able to re-create some dim outline of the strong, sweet, simple soul who sketched for us in these dingy pages the idealisms of his own endeavours.

In troubled Times.

When one recalls what troubled times were those in England to which this MS. belongs, one hesitates whether most to admire the detachment of spirit and self-created repose which could find occasion and ability for such a piece of work, or to be shocked at the indifference or ignorance which could allow of concentration upon studies of this kind when such weighty matters were at hazard in the world outside. The balance of one's judgment, however, is towards admiration. And one rejoices in the presence of a spirit so calm, self-contained, and trustful of a happy issue.

But even our admiration must be tempered with the qualifying reflection that the seclusion of the monastic cell may well have safeguarded the very ears of our author from much acquaintance with the outside noises; and to one who had already made the great renunciation there need be little difficulty of renunciation in particulars. And yet—who knows?—this man may have been a strenuous controversialist in his day; may even have been one of the deputation that interviewed the House of Commons on the question of the repeal of Præmunire, and Pope Martin's excommunication of Archbishop Chichele.

He may have been a man of affairs, to whom such MSS. as this were the recreations of spare time, the parerga of a many-sided life. At all events let us judge him by his own standards and assume he had happily attained to that "secunde actyf lyf" which consists in a just balance of the contemplative and energetic tendencies. Nor must it be overlooked in any attempt at biographical reconstruction that, upon internal evidence which we cannot here claim space to elaborate, the present work is more probably a transcript of an earlier, than itself an original, document.

The MS. hitherto Unpublished.

So far as has been hitherto ascertainable this MS. has never been in print. It is not certain that any second copy exists. Let us then quote a few passages that readers may judge for themselves of its character.

It is divided into chapters, with rubric summaries of the contents of each, and head-lines in Latin apportioning daily lections. The text is in black, with blue initials decorated in red; divided, by blue and red markings alternately, into paragraphs; and marginal analysis, in Latin and English.

Our fragment begins at the close of Chapter XXXII., and concludes with the opening sentences of LVI.

A Passage from the MS.

Commencing at Chapter XXXIII. we read:—

"Befell upon a time that our Lord Jesus went with his disciples into Bethany, that was cleped the castle of Martha and Mary, and came into the house of them.

"And they that loved him with all their hearts were glad and joyful of his coming. And Martha, the elder sister, that had the cure of the household, anon busied her, and went fast about to ordain for the meat covenable [suitable] to him and his disciples.

"But her sister Mary, forgetting all bodily meat, and desiring sovereignly to be fed ghostly of our Lord Jesus, set her down on the ground at his feet, and casting her eyes and her heart and her ears unto him only, with more joy and liking than may be spoken, was fed ghostly and comforted in the blessed words of our Lord Jesus. For he would not be idle but as his common manner was occupied him with speaking of edification and words of everlasting life. Martha, that was so busily occupied," &c. Here follows some dialogue, representing the scene familiar to us from St. John's Gospel, and then these comments:—

"In this process of the Gospel, so close touched after the letter, we mown [are able to] note and understand many fair things ghostly for our edification. And first, the great goodness of our Lord Jesus in his homely coming to that poor house of those twain sisters Martha and Mary . . . and after then, secondly, resting in contemplation; that is to say in solitude, at the least of heart forsaking all worldly business; with all his might be about continually to think on God and heavenly things only tending to please God. . . . And so after the foresaid process first it behoveth that in the first part of active life man's soul be purged of vices and strengthened and comforted in virtues. After that it be informed, taught and lightened in contemplative life. And then in the third degree may he sikerly go out to governance and profit of others, as it is said. Upon this foresaid process of Bonaventure so shortly touched he allegeth after many authorities of Saint Bernard for to prove all the parts thereof; that is to say, the first of active, the second contemplative, and the third that is the second of active life. . . And that is the cause that in this time many there be, both men and women, in the estate of contemplative life, as specially ancres [anchorites] and recluses and hermits that witten little as in effect truly what contemplative life is, by default of exercise in active life as it is before said. . . ."

Life Active and Contemplative.

Here follows much moralising upon the idleness of the "Religious" enforced by quotation from Jeremiah and St. Gregory: and passing on to an illustration dear to the theologico-philosophical essayists and poets of the middle ages in these words:—"All this saith Gregory hereto according Saint Bernard and all other doctors generally; seeing that who so will go duly to contemplative life it behoveth that he be first proved in exercise of active life. In figure whereof is alleged commonly the story of the twain daughters of Laban, the which Jacob took to his wives, that were cleped the elder Leah that was sore-eyed but plenteous in bearing children, by whom is tokened active life; the younger was Rachel, fair and lovely, but barren; and by her is tokened contemplative life."

After several further paragraphs of reflection upon the duties and privileges of active and contemplative life respectively, occurs this passage, which has a special and very remarkable interest of its own:—

"Who so would more plainly be informed and taught in English tongue let him look the treatise that the worthy clerk and holy liver, Master Walter Hilton, the Canon of Thurgarton,* wrote in English by great grace and high discretion, and he shall find there as I leve [believe] a sufficient school and a true of all these. Whose soul rest in everlasting peace, as I hope he be full high in bliss joined and knit without departing to his spouse Jesus by perfect use of the best part that he chose here with Mary. Of the which part he grant us fellowship, Jesus our Lord God. Amen."

Who was this Walter Hilton?

A voluminous writer of his day, known to us in the ascription of many works; and still more noteworthy as one for whom some claim is made to the authorship of the De Imitatione, traditionally associated with the name of Thomas à Kempis. Space forbids to quote more than a further small sample or two.

The Raising of Lazarus.

Let us take this from the account of the Raising of Lazarus:—

"Furthermore at the asking of Our Lord whether she believed that he said of himself that he was resurrection and life, and of everlasting life of all them that trowed soothfastly in him, she answered finally thus, I believe that thou art Christ, God's Son, that art come into this world for man's salvation.† And then at the bidding of Jesus she went home and cleped Mary her sister in silence, that is to say in soft speaking, saying to her in this manner, Our Master has come and clepeth thee to him. And anon she rose up and went to him.

"Our Lord. . . afterward lifting up his eyes to heaven said Father I thank Thee for Thou hast heard me, and soothly I wot well that Thou hearest me ever, but I say this for the people that here stand that they believe that Thou hast sent me. And when he had said this he cried with a great voice Lazare come out of the grave.

"Ah, Lord Jesus, what need was there to cry? Soothly, as Saint Austin saith, to shew in ghostly understanding how hard it is for him for to rise to life of soul that is overlaid with the stone of deadly sin in custom. . . . Ah, Lord Jesus, raise these folk as Thou raisedst Lazare. For Thou art soothly, as Thou sayest, resurrection or uprising and life."

Then follows a discourse on death in trespasses and sins, and the rising to new life through God, "with His grete grace clepinge."

The Crucifixion.

Hitherto we have modernised the spelling that the subject matter may have the less of any mere quaintness to influence the reader's judgment upon it. Our final quotation shall be in its original orthography, only modified to the usages of present-day typography, certain obsolete forms of words and technical abbreviations being also changed.

The events of the Passion are given by the chronological nomenclature of the Canonical Hours, e.g., "Of the bringinge of oure Lord Jhū bifore Pilate at prime." "How oure Lord Jhs was dampned to ye deth of ye crosse aboute teerce of ye day."

It is interesting to note, in view of the controversy which surges round the use of the word, that in this account we have Annas spoken of as a "Bishop." Is it a simple anachronism such as contemporary moralities and miracle plays abounded in? After a singularly vivid portrayal of the preliminary scenes, with many a graphic touch born of sympathetic insight and an artistic imagination, we come to this passage:—"Of ye crucifyinge of our Lord Jhū at ye sixte houre."

"Now ferthermore maiht [mayest] thou see whan oure lord jhs was come to that stinkinge hille of Calvarye how wikkedly tho(se) cursede werkmen bigūnne to werke on all sides that cruelle werche. Take heede now diligently with al thine herte, to alle tho(se) things that ben now to come and make thee there present in thi mynde, biholdinge al that shal be doon agens thi lord Jhū. . . . And so with ye innere eye of thi soule bihold summe settinge and ficchinge the crosse faste into the eerthe, some makinge redy the nailes and the hammers to dryve them with. Othere makinge redy and settinge up ladders and ordeynynge othere instrumentes that hem thou(g)ht nedeful. And oothere faste aboute to spoile him, and drawe of hise clothes. And so is he now the thridde time spoiled and standeth naked in siht of al that peple. And so ben now the thridde time reneuede the brysours [bruises] of the woundes in his scoorginge, bi the clevinge of the clothes to his flech. . . . But [his mother] mi(g)ht do no more to him nor helpe him, ffor if she mi(g)ht with outen doute she wolde; thanne was hire sone anoon taken out of hire handes in wood [fierce] manere and lad to the foot of the crosse.

"Now take heede diligently to the manere of crucifyinge. Ther ben sette up tweyne ladderes, oon bihynde and an oother bifore at the left arme of the crosse, upon the which tho(se) wikkede ministres goon up with nailes and hameres. Also an other short laddere is sette bifore the crosse that lasteth up to the place where hise feet shulden be nailed. Now tak good heede to all that folweth. Oure lord thanne was compelled and beden for to go up on that laddere to the crosse. And he mekely dooth al that thei bidden him, and whan he cam up to the overeste ende of that shorte laddere he turnede his bak to the crosse, and streiht out on brede [abroad] those kinges arms and hise fairest handes gave up to them that crucifyed him.

"And thanne liftinge up hise lovely eyen to hevene seide to the Father in this manere woordes:

"'Loo, heere I am, my dere fadir [Father], as Thou woldest that I shulde lowe myself unto the crosse for the salvacioun of mankynde, and that is plesinge and acceptable to me, and for (t)hem I offre myself the whiche Thow woldest shulde be my brethren. Wherefore also thow, Father, take gladly this sacrifice for (t)hem of me, and now hensforward be plesed and wel willed to them for my love, and al old offence and trespasse forgive and wype awey and putte aferre [afar] al unclennesse of sinne fro(m) (t)hem, for soothly I offre heere now myself for (t)hem and (t)here hele.'

"And thanne he that was on the laddere bihynde the crosse taketh his ri(g)ht hand and naileth it faste to the crosse, and after he that was on the left side draweth with al his miht the lift arm and hand and driveth ther thoruh [through] an oother gret nail. After they camen doun and taken away alle the ladderes, and so hangeth oure lord only bi tho(se) tweyne nayles smyten thoruh hise handes, withouten sustenaunce of the body, drawinge downward peynefully thoruh the weyghte therof. Heerwith also an oother harlotte renneth too and draweth doun hise feet with al his miht and an oother anoon dryveth a gret long nayl thoruh bothe hise feet joined to gidere [together].

"This is oon manere of his crucifyinge after the opinyoun of summe men. . . ."

The Author's Imagination.

Our author proceeds to give an alternative account, much more in accordance with historical probability. But the existence of these conflicting traditions is an interesting illustration of the contemporary influence of attempts then frequent enough to reconstruct history on the basis of a lively imagination. Here, as elsewhere in this MS., and in most similar documents, we have the ecclesiastical spirit reading into the matter-of-fact statements of the Gospel story the theological deductions of a later day.

It may argue a certain obtuseness—prejudice if you like—in our author's mental vision; but he lived before the days of the "Historic Method," and we have no sense of a conscious dishonesty to spoil our appreciation of his pen-pictures.

Would that in days like these, when the so-called "religious" romances of Marie Corelli and other such mawkish scribblers sell by the hundred thousand, a sufficient public might be counted upon to warrant the publication of such a work as this, which, though it may be more romance than history, is more religious than romantic, and fraught with a strong, sane, manly sentiment rare in the age that gave it birth, and very rare—at least in its religious writings—in our own.

Before the Reformation.

This work antedates by many years the Reformation. Wycliffe, indeed, had been and was gone. At the very moment while this MS. was being written it may have been that, under the influence of the reactionary impetus engendered by the Council of Constance, his bones were dug up, burnt, and cast into the Swift.

But his soul went marching along! Perhaps it was not without its influence on this author of ours.*

It yet lacked sixty † years to the birth of Tyndale; about fifty till the setting up of Caxton's first printing press at Westminster.

But in this MS. we can at least trace the stuff the Reformation was to be made of. The moral earnestness, spiritual insight, other-worldliness, which—and not the cataclysm of political chicanery, self-interest, and patriotic ambition, albeit efficient factors each and all to be taken into account—gave it birth and brought it to be something other than a political revolution or an English Renaissance of Letters.

There are many features of interest about this MS. upon which one is tempted to digress. But they belong rather to the class than to any particular instance of it. We are content if enough has been said to kindle in any heart a wider and more intelligent sympathy with those great souls who, in the miscalled "Ages of Faith," kept alive for us amid the thick darkness of superstition and vulgar grossness the "tender grace of a day that is gone," and can never come back to us.

Remains only to add that the MS. belongs to Mr. J. J. Green, Archivist, of Tunbridge Wells, to whom our warm acknowledgments are due for permission to give it publicity, and for valuable assistance in the preparation of these notes. H. A. R. J.

THE FORGET-ME-NOTS.

WHEN I lay sick and full of care,
And thought my Friend forgot,
I made a little flower of prayer—
My poor "Forget-me-not";
And, though sweet Faith was vext with me
And chid me for my fears,
She took on high, for Him to see,
That flower bedew'd with tears.

Ah, weary night! My restless mind
Went flitting to and fro,
Some token of His love to find,
Whose love I needed so;
But, as the long dark hours crept by,
Each left me more forlorn,
Until the flush was in the sky
That ushers in the morn.

Then came sweet Faith, and with her brought
A sheaf of flowers divine,
The token of a wiser Thought,
A truer Heart than mine;
And all the shadows passed away
In which my love forgot
The Love that sends me every day
Its great "FORGET-ME-NOT."

W. G. TARRANT.

* The preference for English over Latin as the medium of his narrative may be such a feature. The Lollards are referred to at least twice in the MS.

† The date of Tyndale's birth can only be fixed approximately as between 1477–84.

CARMARTHEN COLLEGE AND THE BAPTISTS.

SIR,—I am requested by the Managers of the Presbyterian Fund, who are the Governors of the Presbyterian College at Carmarthen, to ask you to be good enough to publish this letter and the enclosed correspondence relating to an honours graduate student of University College, Cardiff, who applied to the Board for one of their recently-established scholarships.

These scholarships, which are of the value of £40 a year, are open to students of all denominations who are desirous of obtaining the B.D. Degree of the University of Wales, and the candidate is expected to follow a three years' course of study at the College. The application was considered, and the scholarship granted by the Board to Mr. X. in March last. It was not until one week before the College session that the slightest hint reached the College authorities that Mr. X. was thinking of relinquishing his scholarship, and not until Sept. 29, the day before College opens, that any official intimation was received. The Board believe Mr. X.'s resignation to have been forced upon him by persistent and most unwelcome pressure on the part of the "Committee," on whose behalf Messrs. Thomas and Phillips write, and that they have represented themselves as acting on behalf of the Baptist denomination generally.

The action taken by this Baptist Committee is so unusual that for the protection of future students and in the interests of the College the Board deem it a duty to publish these letters.

The name of the student concerned, to whom no blame appears to attach, has been replaced by X.

E. HAROLD CLENNELL,
Secretary to the Managers of the Presbyterian Fund.

CORRESPONDENCE.

21, Llandough-street, Cardiff.
Sept. 29, 1902.

To the Governing Body of the Presbyterian College, Carmarthen.

Gentlemen,—You have probably heard from Mr. X. announcing his intention to resign the Scholarship awarded him by you, and to proceed to Oxford.

Seeing that we are responsible for his decision, we feel it to be due to you, and just to him, that we should offer an explanation.

As the testimonials presented to you with his application showed, Mr. X. is a man of exceptional ability, and his career hitherto has been watched with great interest by his friends, and much regret has been expressed that the College system of his own denomination did not afford the opportunity for advancement which could be utilised by a man of his capacity.

The lack of such opportunities was the occasion of his availing himself of the Berman Scholarship.

His friends have long wished that he should have the advantage of an Oxford training, but difficulties which up till the present have appeared unsurmountable have deterred them from action.

Those difficulties, however, have now disappeared, and an influential committee has been formed to carry out arrangements. Their success has justified to the Committee the exercising of pressure on Mr. X. to alter his plans.

We are convinced that in doing this the Committee are conforming to the general desire of all who know him.

The persuading of Mr. X. to relinquish the Scholarship was very difficult, as he realised a deep obligation to you, for the courteous and generous way in which his application was received and granted, and we feel sure that nothing but what he at length saw was a pressing call from the denomination at large would have been effective to make him resign his Scholarship.

The Committee cannot close without gratefully recognising your kindness in this matter, and hoping that this change will not cause any great disturbance in your arrangements.

We have the honour to remain, on behalf of Committee,

Yours obediently,

W. P. THOMAS,
W. T. PHILLIPS, } Secretaries.

(REPLY.)

Dr. Williams's Library,

Nov. 6, 1902.

Dear Sirs,—The Presbyterian Board have received with great regret the communication which you addressed to them on Sept. 29, and they feel bound to protest against the action taken by your Committee.

Mr. X., of whom under the circumstances the Board do not desire to speak with anything but sympathy, had given a deliberate pledge which he felt to be binding on his conscience and honour until your Committee, approaching him in the name of religion, induced him to break it.

The Presbyterian Board refuse to believe that the "denomination at large"—(by which I suppose you mean the Baptist denomination)—referred to in your letter can have given any countenance to this proceeding, although you appear to have used their name to overbear this young man.

In loyalty to the principles upheld by that denomination and every other denomination which the College at Carmarthen is intended to serve, they repel the suggestion that any body of men, however "influential," can be justified in inciting a young preacher to a breach of faith, or have authority to absolve him from his obligations to others.

Your Committee, taking responsibility as it does for Mr. X.'s decision, can have no objection to the publication of this correspondence, a copy of which I am about to send to the Press with a few words of introduction explaining the terms under which the Scholarship was granted.

Yours faithfully,
G. HAROLD CLENNELL,
Secretary Presbyterian Fund.

A TROUBLED VISION.

SIR,—In his interesting criticism of Mr. H. G. Wells's somewhat whimsical forecast of the religion of the future, Dr. Warschauer objects to his statement that in the coming decadence of the human race such a change shall be possible that "In the thought of God the antagonisms between good and evil shall vanish," for "God is no moralist," and expresses the hope that "a writer of so much acuteness" will some day discover this to be an "inadequate conception." Of course all our human conceptions of the Great Central Soul of the Universe must be "inadequate," and if we look only at the mechanical and the material world, as we know it, as in any way a full expression of the character of God we shall have many "a troubled vision," and find many riddles which no man can read. Man is physically powerless in the face of the great forces of nature, such as earthquakes, volcanoes, and tempests. As J. S. Mill writes in his "Essay on Nature:" "Nearly all the things which men are hanged and imprisoned for doing to one another are nature's everyday performances," and "the physical government of the world being full of the things which when done by men are deemed the greatest enormities, it cannot be religious or moral in us to guide our actions by the analogy of the course of nature."

We must learn to "know God," therefore, not as revealed in physical nature, but as dwelling in Man. Cannot we see him groping after God out of the dim ages of animalism? Do we not discover the gradual evolution of soul and conscience?

And emerging from the weary struggle of selfishness, can we not trace the gradual rise of a spirit of self-sacrificing Love? So that instead of a few hundred years finding the race brought into the image of a God who "is no moralist," may we not hope that the Spirit of God which moved in Poet and Seer and Prophet, and supremely in Jesus, will so be able to manifest Himself in human life that many of the physical evils of which we are so sadly conscious will be largely overcome by the growth of mankind in holiness, and the more perfect command of nature's forces? If the "Gospel of the Golden Rule" is inspired by the same Holy Spirit which can also lead our race to the daily practice of that Golden Rule, then we need not fear that in the future mankind will go back to savage life, or degenerate into a hateful selfishness from which every man must shrink who has "a sense of communion with God, however dim"; and, as with the passing ages, ever new light and truth shall dawn upon us, we shall find it more and more impossible to conceive the frightful horror of an immoral God. Let us all with the wise and gentle Whittier not fear the future, but

> Take heart! the waster builds again—
> A charmed life old goodness hath;
> The tares may perish, but the grain
> Is not for death.
> God works in all things; all obey
> His first propulsion from the night;
> No, wake and watch! the world is grey
> With morning light.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

YORKSHIRE UNITARIAN UNION.

THE great event of the last quarter in our little community of Yorkshire churches was the welcome of Mr. Vaughan to the ministry of the Park-street congregation at Hull. I do not remember to have ever been present at a meeting of the kind which was so effective, so solemn, so cheerful, so promising—all of them together. It spoke well for Mr. Vaughan that he had succeeded in bringing the two Principals of our colleges to the far away corner of England where he had cast his lot. With two such men—their very presence bearing witness to the esteem they entertained for the former pupil of both of them—the success of the meeting was assured. Dr. Drummond gave to the minister an address which seemed to me—perhaps because I was in a more than usually receptive mood—the deepest and most touching I had ever heard from him; while Mr. Gordon, after his usual manner, mingled wit and learning in his own special and unrivalled blend. We had, too, the unexpected gratification of a contribution to the harmony and hopefulness of the gathering from Professor Upton, who had been supplying the pulpit the Sunday before.

With any one of these three and the aid of local talent we should have felt that Mr. Vaughan had been given a good start on his way. But what was to my mind more impressive than anything said by the wise and noble of the denomination was the testimony paid to the new minister by the Rev. Joseph Wain, who had come the furthest of any for the occasion. The three college dignitaries could speak of Mr. Vaughan as a devout and diligent and intelligent scholar who gave good promise to distinguish himself as a no less devout, intelligent and diligent minister. But Mr. Wain could tell us of his actual work before yet he had become a student, how the raw lad applied to him when missionary at Bristol, and was given the most difficult class in the Sunday-school to try his prentice hand on. It was a testimonial which was worth all the rest, for indispensable as scholarship ought to be for the office of teacher, more important still is the assurance that the man's heart is in his work.

Indeed, I would venture to submit it to our college committees whether they should not ask of all candidates for admission as students on the foundation, seeking pecuniary support during the time of their studies and looking forward to making their living by the ministry of religion—What have you done? What proof can you give that your heart is in the work? Howare we to be assured that it is not a fancy you have taken for the ministry as a nice and respectable profession? It is to little purpose to ask, as the Bishop does of candidates for ordination, "Do you trust that you are inwardly moved by the Holy Ghost? Do you think that you are truly called to the ministry of the Church?" The answer to such question is the fact that those of whom it is asked are there present, awaiting the laying on of hands. Such questions may serve for a solemn reminder of what duties they have undertaken, but from a committee they would be both useless and impertinent. Such a body of business men can only ask, and I submit that it is at once their right and their duty to ask it: Have you as yet done anything, by way of study, teaching, punctual attendance at public worship, help as far as was possible to you in the work of your Church, anything at all to prove to us that your heart is given to the work, and that you are in any wise capable of its various duties?

I do not, of course, mean this as a reproof of any committee. I am not fault-finding, but urging the importance of that which may perhaps sometimes be overlooked. Mr. Vaughan's proved call to the ministry while he was yet but a lad must be my excuse.

One thing only was lacking to this welcome, and I mention it with pain. It was the presence of Yorkshire ministers. There were three of us present and, I believe, sixteen absent. Of course there were good reasons in some cases, and the county is big and we are widely scattered, and the expense of travelling is a serious consideration to many of us. And yet there should have been a larger representation to welcome a new minister to one of our most important and oldest churches.

I wish I could write of the later welcome of Mr. Dolphin to the ministry at Upperthorpe. I regretted most sincerely that it was fixed on a day on which I could not be present. Mr. Dolphin has a difficult task before him, if he is determined—as I have no manner of doubt that he is—to maintain the high standard of diligence and efficiency set by his predecessor, Mr. Ellis. I hope he will remember that he is a Yorkshire minister and not merely the pastor of one congregation. He has the right to the interest and sympathy of us all in his work, and I trust he will give before waiting to see whether he will get his due.

To turn to a church which cannot look forward to any welcoming of a minister for a long time to come. The state of affairs as they are reported to me from Elland confirms me in the opinion I have often expressed that there are circumstances under which a congregation may do better without a minister than with. Where a small body of men of independent way of thinking, but dependent on their daily work for a living, are gathered into a Church, they are apt to require of a minister far more than the stipend they can by any means raise will entitle them to. And failing to get what they cannot pay the price of, all kinds of troubles are gendered, making the life of the minister miserable and the affairs of the congregation an open scandal. When it is so, the best advice to give, in my opinion, is—shift for yourselves and we will give such help to you as lies in our power. We have had, indeed, sore trouble at Elland, but they seem now to be holding well together, of their own good will, there being no minister to tempt them to rebel against being held. They are having week-evening meetings as well as Sunday services, and seem to be in good spirits, planning out the winter's work.

We have decided to hold a bazaar next autumn in aid of the funds of our Union, for we have many pressing needs and a big deficit. The examples of Manchester and London encourage and at the same time intimidate us, for though we are the biggest of counties, we are few in number and very widely scattered, and cannot hope to do anything like what has been done at our two great centres. But we shall be satisfied with less. For my part, I shall be satisfied, whatever the result may be, if only we do succeed in getting the cordial co-operation of every church, large and small, in Yorkshire. Of the smaller, indeed, we are pretty well assured. It is of some of the larger I entertain fears, for which I pray that I may later on have to apologise, which, indeed, I will do most humbly and gladly.

CHARLES HARGROVE.

THE CENSUS OF IRELAND.

A REPORT of the census of Ireland has just been issued. It appears that the population had fallen from 4,704,750 in 1891 to 4,458,775 in 1901, a decrease of 245,975 persons, or 5·23 per cent. At the same time the number of English-born persons residing in Ireland had increased from 74,523 to 76,977, and the Scotch-born persons had increased from 27,323 to 30,101, and foreign-born persons from 21,521 to 24,750. The number of Roman Catholics had fallen from 3,547,307 to 3,308,661, a decrease of 238,646 persons, and of 6·7 per cent. on their own number, and a fall in percentage on the whole population from 75·39 to 74·29. The Protestant Episcopalians, formerly the Church of England and Ireland, fell from 600,103 to 581,089, a fall of 3·2 per cent. on their own number. Presbyterians fell from 444,974 to 443,276, a fall of 0·4 per cent. on their own number. Methodists increased from 55,500 to 62,006, and all other persuasions increased from 56,866 to 63,743.

We are told that in 1891, 70·6 per cent. of the population aged five years and upwards were able to read and write, and in 1901, 79·4 per cent., so that education appears to begin at a very early age.

With respect to occupations there was a falling off in the professional, domestic, and agricultural populations, but a rise in the commercial class, and a rise in the percentage of the industrial class. The ratable value of property had risen from £14,034,681 1s. 9d. to £14,932,754 1s. The number of emigrants from Ireland during the decade was 430,993, the number during the previous decade having been 768,105.

The numbers of blind, deaf, dumb, and idiots had fallen off with the population, but the number of lunatics had increased, as it had also in the previous decade. The amount of grass-land had increased, while the acreage of tilled land and barren land showed a diminution in each case. Cattle and poultry had increased; other animals had decreased.

The number of persons who could speak Irish only had fallen from 38,192 in 1891 to 20,953 in 1901; and those who could speak both languages from 642,053 to 620,189.

If representation in Parliament were made proportional to population Ireland would lose about thirty members and England gain the same number, Scotland remaining as at present.

THE organising secretary of the National Unitarian Temperance Association has sent us a list of special preachers in our London Churches for Temperance Sunday, Nov. 30. The list is probably not yet complete, but we hope it may be so by next week, when we shall publish it.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Aberdare: Old Meeting.—The Harvest Thanksgiving services last Sunday were conducted by the Rev. Lewis Williams (in Welsh) and the Rev. H. Fisher Short, the new minister at Highland-place (in English).

Bolton: Bank-street.—The preparation class for young people, conducted by the Rev. C. J. Street, M.A., LL.B., has a membership this year of thirty-eight, the subject of study being "Religion, its Basis, Development, and Application."

Bolton: Unity Church.—On Tuesday week Mr. John Harwood gave a very successful recital in the school, the selections being from Shakespeare, Dickens, and other authors.

Choppington.—On Wednesday, Nov. 5, a lecture was given by the Rev. F. Walters, of Newcastle, who took for his subject, "Was Jesus God?" Many in the audience had walked some four and a-half miles each way, on a dark and wet night, to this lecture, which was warmly appreciated. At the close of the lecture the people were asked to correspond with Mr. Walters on any doubts or questions they might want cleared up.

Colne.—On Saturday afternoon, Nov. 8, a service was held for the induction of the Rev. Robert McGee, formerly minister of Lower Darwen Congregational Church. The first part of the service was conducted by the Rev. J. J. Shaw, of Newchurch, the charge to the minister being given by the Rev. C. J. Street, and that to the congregation by the Rev. J. Morley Mills. Mr. Street, in the course of his charge, said that Mr. McGee's record in the Congregational Church had been an honourable one, and the presence at that service of three members of the Lower Darwen Congregational Church, to which he had ministered for twelve years, as well as the letter from the ministerial secretary of the Lancashire Congregational Union, bore testimony to the regard in which he was held. It was with pain that the separation had been made, but he was to be congratulated on the spiritual emancipation which had left him free to follow the dictates of his own conscience. They welcomed him into the Unitarian fellowship. In the evening a public meeting of recognition was held.

Crumlin: co. Antrim.—On Friday evening, Nov. 7, the annual Thanksgiving for the Harvest, which was late this year, was held, when the Rev. Alfred Davison, of Dromore, gave a very helpful address.

High Peak Chapels (Resignation).—The Rev. Sydney H. Street, B.A., has resigned his position as minister of the chapels at Great Hucklow, Bradwell and Flagg, and superintendent of the Holiday Home at Great Hucklow, and will terminate his engagement at the end of March.

Ipswich.—During the past month the sermons preached on Sunday evenings by the Rev. L. Tavener have been based upon the papers and discussions of the recent Church Congress at Northampton. Under the headings of "Biblical Criticism," "Social Problems," "Miracles," and "The Gospels," the preacher dealt with the many utterances at the Congress which showed a tendency on the part of leading members of the Church of England towards positions long maintained by Unitarians. Two very successful lectures have been delivered in connection with the Social Guild. On Oct. 21 the Rev. L. Tavener lectured to a large audience (not by any means confined to members of the congregation) on "Edward Fitzgerald," well known in Ipswich and the neighbourhood, from his life-long connection with the district, and known to a far wider circle as the translator of the Persian poet "Omar Khayyam." The lecture was illustrated by lantern views prepared by the lecturer, showing places connected with Fitzgerald's life and Vedder's illustrations of the Rubaiyat. On Nov. 4 Mr. H. W. Roberts delivered a delightful lecture on "Ely Cathedral," illustrated by sketches, photographs, and an excellent series of lantern views. There was a large audience, and the lecture was keenly appreciated.

Moretonhampstead (Centenary Celebrations).—On Thursday, Oct. 30, the centenary of the opening of the present Cross Chapel was celebrated. An impressive and well-attended service was held in the afternoon, conducted by the Rev. A. Lancaster, resident minister, and the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, of Bristol, preached an eloquent sermon on "The Man Christ Jesus." After tea, at which nearly 100 sat down, a public meeting was held in the Smethurst schoolroom. Mr. Lancaster, in the absence of Mr. T. B. Bowring, who was prevented from being present, took the chair, and was supported by the Revs. A. N. Blatchford, T. B. Broadrick, J. Worthington, A. E. O'Connor, G. L. Phelps, and J. Barron. The Rev. A. Blake, Congregationalist, sent a letter of good wishes. The Chairman gave an interesting address on the history of the congregation, which had its origin in the ejection of the rector, the Rev. Robert Woollcombe, in 1662, who not only sacrificed his living at the call of conscience, but was disinherited by his father. Some of his parishioners, however, clung to him, and in spite of persecution, they held meetings for religious worship. Returning to Moreton once more after the passing of the Five Mile Act, Mr. Woollcombe suffered imprisonment, and it was only after the passing of the Toleration Act in 1689 that they were able to meet openly and to provide themselves with a humble chapel. After Mr. Woollcombe's death in 1692 there was a division in the congregation, and a new chapel was built on the site of their present burial-ground, their next minister, the Rev. Angel Sparks, finding most of the money. In 1801 that chapel had to be pulled down, and the congregation worshipped with the General Baptists of the town until the present chapel was opened in 1802. Both they and the Baptists had by that time become Unitarians, and when, after some years of dependence on lay-preachers, the Rev. J. Smethurst in 1817 settled in Moreton, the two congregations became one. Their school was a memorial of Mr. Smethurst and his work. Addresses were also given by the other ministers present. Centenary services were continued on Sunday, Nov. 2, when the pulpit was occupied by the Rev. H. S. Solly, of Bridport. Good congregations assembled both morning and afternoon, and listened attentively to two very able and interesting sermons.

Newton Heath.—A recital was given in the Dob-lane schools on Nov. 5 by Mr. John Harwood, the selections being from Shakespeare, Dickens, and other authors, and was much appreciated.

North Lancashire and Westmorland Unitarian Association.—The annual conference was held at Preston on Saturday, Oct. 25, and was well attended. In the afternoon a public service in Percy-street Chapel was conducted by the Rev. N. Anderton and the President of the Association, the Rev. H. V. Mills preached a thoughtful sermon on the Divine significance of life as seen in the whole order of Creation, and especially of human nature, prophetic of good as "the final goal of ill." After tea in the schoolroom, the public meeting was held, at which the secretary, Mr. R. Newell, of Preston, presented the annual report, which spoke of the formation of the Association a year ago, the object being the uniting of the scattered congregations of North Lancashire and Westmorland for purposes of mutual intercourse and fellowship, and for promoting such efforts as might extend the influence and usefulness of the churches. Conferences had been held in different parts of the district during the year on behalf of the Sunday-schools, congregations, and choir, and public lectures had been given by the Revs. H. V. Mills, J. C. Pollard, N. Anderton, and D. Davis. A series of lectures on the subject of "Religious Experiences," similar to the addresses given at Essex Hall last Whitsuntide, is planned for January and February, to be given by the Revs. J. J. Shaw, of Newchurch; Francis Wood, of Sunderland; E. W. Lummis, of Warrington; R. McGee, of Colne; and C. Hargrove, of Leeds. The financial statement presented by Mr. F. Chadderton (treasurer) showed that a great amount of useful work has been accomplished with a small income, leaving a balance in hand of £2 15s. 11d. The officers were re-elected. The Rev. H. V. Mills, in the course of his presidential address, referred to the subject of successful churches. As a boy, he said, I lived in a town where I had remarkable opportunities of studying the conditions of successful church-life. It was a small town, but it had almost the most successful Swedenborgian congregation in England. Now unpopular as we are, the Swedenborgians are less popular. So I think that we may study the things which created success for this unregarded church in that particular district. Every incident in the life of that church revealed a spirit of brotherhood amongst the members, so that they helped each other in business emergencies; and there were twenty or perhaps twenty-five families who so sincerely loved the "New Jerusalem Church" that they never sacrificed any religious duty on the Sunday, no matter what the temptation. They had interesting novels to read, but they never stayed from service to read them. They were content with cold and simple dinners, and would have been miserable indeed if they and all their children had not been present at both services. At present I minister in a small town of 13,000 inhabitants, but it is remarkable as having one of the few very large Quaker meetings. I trace its successful religious life—not to brilliant preachers nor to any external aid—but to the fact which is evident to casual visitors, that there is an atmosphere of earnestness and patient continuance in well-doing in that church which is very contagious when once it is found. We need this enthusiastic atmosphere about our churches which will make us do even "foolish" things to secure the welfare of our congregations. Something depends on the preacher; but the personal welcome which is needed by the visitor is also of the utmost importance, and this can best be given by the members of the congregation. We must never forget that additions to our membership-roll come singly; and never allow the thought to rest in our minds that a single stranger attending the morning service occasionally is of no importance. Let us gain the esteem and goodwill of one such stranger every month, and we shall do our own souls good and improve the numerical strength of all our churches.

Norwich.—An enthusiastic meeting of young people was held on Thursday, Oct. 30, to inaugurate a Guild of Service. The chair was taken by the Rev. Alfred Hall, who, after a hymn and prayer, gave a short address on the Guild Idea and Work. The chief objects, he said, were to foster the religious life and to inspire personal service. The natural and only link between the Sunday-school and the church were the young people, and it was no light duty for them to bridge the gulf which often yawned between these two institutions. He then gave a few instances of the philanthropic work the guild could undertake. A resolution was passed, on the motion of Mr. Prime, that those present should form themselves into a guild, which should be called the Octagon Chapel Guild of Service. The motto of the guild should be "Look outward, not inward; look upward, not downward; look forward, not backward; and lend a hand." It was resolved that meetings should be held fortnightly on Mondays; those above the age of fourteen should be eligible as members. All present, numbering forty, enrolled themselves as the first members. New members will be added by election after having been proposed and seconded. Several subsections for carrying out certain work will be formed under the guild, which will thus become an active philanthropic arm of the church.

South Shields.—A company of the Boys' Own Brigade has been formed, with Mr. Thomas Paxton as Captain, to meet on Saturday evenings. Last Sunday evening Mr. Paxton preached on "Municipal Corruption."

Tamworth.—A good congregation, which included the Mayor and Deputy-Mayor, assembled for the service when the annual collection was made for for the B. and F.U.A., amounting to £1 7s. The sermon was preached by the Rev. F. W. Emms, the minister. On Wednesday, Nov. 5, the Rev. A. H. Shelley preached a special sermon on "Sin in the Light of Evolution."

Wareham.—On Sunday last Mr. Clement Ryley, of Wimborne, gave an address to the children of the Unitarian Sunday-school, and preached on "Vision and Duty" in the evening. There was an excellent congregation.

Whitchurch.—A welcome meeting to the Rev. C. D. Badland, the newly-appointed minister, was held at the Church of the Saviour on Wednesday evening, Nov. 5. Over a hundred sat down to tea, and at the subsequent meeting Mr. George Groom took the chair, supported by the Revs. J. C. Street. A. A. Charlesworth, E. D. Priestley Evans, H. E. Haycock, and Mr. Gresty. The Chairman offered a very hearty welcome to Mr. and Mrs. Badland, in which the ministers present all joined, on behalf of neighbouring churches and the M.C.U. Mr. Badland acknowledged the welcome in an earnest speech, trusting that he might be able to do a really Christian work in the town, and that their offer of a simple yet practical religion would meet with due response.

It will be seen from an advertisement in another column that on Wednesday week the Moral Instruction League are to hold a meeting in the smaller Queen's Hall, to urge the Government to introduce systematic non-theological moral instruction into the State-supported schools. Mr. Harrold Johnson, B.A., is hon. secretary of the League, and the office is at 19, Buckingham-street, Strand, W.C.

It is the prerogative of man to be in great degree the creature of his own making.—Burke.

Readers who love thrilling romance will feel under a debt of gratitude to

Mr. FRED M. WHITE

for his New Story,

A Shadowed Love,

which will commence this week in

THE CHRISTIAN WORLD.

The New Story will introduce the readers of this great Religious Weekly to an author who has not yet been represented in its pages. "A Shadowed Love," we believe, will put its readers on very good terms with Mr. Fred M. White. It is a story quite out of the common, with a lovely blind heroine, around whom centres a tragic mystery. A struggling young novelist and journalist, living with his sister in London, renders a great service to the heroine's father, who is haunted by mortal fear of some imminent peril arising out of a dark chapter in his past. Dick Stevenson, scenting a mystery, begins to wonder whether there is material for a novel in it, but he soon finds himself a leading actor in a drama more startling and fuller of thickly crowding surprises than any story he had ever ventured to imagine. Those readers who pride themselves on foreseeing the end of a novel from the beginning will find themselves baffled for once. Mr. Fred M. White knows how to keep his secret, and we anticipate that as the story progresses there will be impatient waiting, after each instalment, for the continuation in tens of thousands of homes. As the title implies, the love element is prominent, and the love story told is as fragrant as the favourite violets of the sightless heroine. "A Shadowed Love" is a strong, wholesome romance for tired fathers and mothers, to enable them to shake off the cares of the day during the coming winter evenings, but it may be put without fear into the hands of the younger members of the family.

THE CHRISTIAN WORLD is published every Thursday (Price One Penny), and may be obtained from any Bookseller or Newsagent or from the Publishers.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Guilds Union Committee have issued a Prize Essay Scheme, which will be found in another column, and which we commend to the notice of all present and prospective guild members in connection with our churches. The essays invited are on subjects of great interest, and such as should stimulate to a useful course of reading and study. The conditions are not burdensome, and we trust that the scheme will meet with the cordial response which it invites.

WE have received several letters from members of the Hampstead congregation, expressing surprise and regret that in our note of last week, announcing that the Rev. Henry Gow was about to enter on his ministry at Rosslyn-hill Chapel, in succession to Dr. Brooke Herford, no mention was made of the Rev. Edgar Daplyn, who had come to Rosslyn Hill as Dr. Herford's assistant and was subsequently appointed co-pastor, remaining, after Dr. Herford's retirement, in sole charge of the pulpit. Mr. Daplyn is a personal friend of our own, and a regular contributor to these columns, and nothing could be further from our intention than to say or do anything ungenerous or disrespectful to him; only the week before, we had recorded a farewell presentation to him, testifying to the warm regard in which he is held by members of the congregation, and we have every confidence in his future as a minister of devout and singularly winning powers. But the fact remains that when at last it became necessary to appoint a successor to Dr. Herford, it was not Mr. Daplyn, but Mr. Gow, who was chosen; and being aware of the conflicts of opinion there had been over the settlement, it appeared to us more considerate to the feelings of all concerned to make the announcement as we did.

THE method of voting by compartments on the clauses of the Education Bill has killed effective debate, and since Thursday night—or rather, Friday morning—when the Opposition insisted upon taking formal divisions on all questions submitted for the vote, there has been little show of fight over the Bill. On the occasion referred to, Clause 13, which deals with the expenses of the Council as local education authority, was closured and, as amended by Government, was passed. The three following clauses, which deal with borrowing powers, local arrangements, and provisional orders and schemes were passed without comment, but members were forced into the lobbies twenty-one times. An ingenious legislator calculated that he had thus tramped several miles in this midnight illustration of solvere ambulando. Clauses 17 to 20, more or less consequential in character, were similarly passed on Friday. Several new clauses have been added this week, the Committee stage being fixed to conclude on Thursday night. The Report stage is to be concluded next week, and on Dec. 1 the debate on the third reading will begin. Then, of course, comes the discussion in the House of Lords, and it is expected that the Bill will be passed about Dec. 19.

NOTWITHSTANDING the hurried progress thus indicated, the Government have not been allowed unwarned to rush the country forward into the chaos that awaits it. For example, the Government's rigorous determination to limit the elementary schools, both day and evening, in respect of subjects taught, and in the case of day schools to scholars below the age of fifteen, has been exposed, and has suffered damaging contrast with the very effective Scottish system. Of course, the proposers of the Bill ostensibly aim at the establishment of a "secondary system" of education of which the germs and only the germs are visible in the Bill. It is only too clear, however, that, in spite of the higher aims of a few, the general policy of the Tory is what it has always been—to keep the people from knowing too much. The only other educational matter of the past few days is a further drift in favour of the denominational schools, of the landowners who are to be further relieved of financial burdens, and of the clergy with whom there appears to be a new compact made in reference to the matter of the Kenyon-Slaney amendment. At the great meeting held on Friday night at the Albert Hall, the Bishop of London passed on assurances that he had received from persons whose business it was to know the rights of the clergy under the Bill. There would be an appeal to the Bishop if the trust-deed of a school allowed it. Lord Hugh Cecil, with the House of Commons' debate fresh in his memory, was by no means so certain that the Government would give way, and we are left in a state of animated expectancy—or suspicion—as to what the Lords will do in the matter.

A PUBLIC meeting is to be held on Monday evening next in the Caxton Hall, Westminster (formerly the Town Hall, close to St. James's Park Station), on "Women's Suffrage in its relation to Philanthropic, Social and Temperance Work." The chair is to be taken at 8 o'clock by Prebendary Ridgeway, supported by Lady Frances Balfour, Mr. W. R. Bousfield, M.P., Miss A. L. Browne, Mr. Percy Bunting, Miss Cons and others. Among the speakers announced are Mrs. Bryant, D.Sc., Mrs. Allan Bright (President of the Liverpool Women's Settlement), Lord Kinnaird and the Rev. W. Russell Wakefield.

THE Bishop of Liverpool delivered last week a striking charge to the clergy of his diocese, on the occasion of his first triennial Visitation. Three great evils he noted, against which they had to contend—partisanship, individualism and materialism. As to the first of these, he said some strong things on the subject of clergymen who defied the law of the Church in following out their own extreme views of ritual. The persistence of such men could only lead to disestablishment and disruption of the Church at no distant period. As to the method of dealing with such rebellious elements he had made up his mind. Inactivity encouraged the mischief, and prosecution which led to imprisonment made martyrs. There remained a third course, that of Episcopal excommunication. He must treat the offenders as self-made Nonconformists, and refuse to be present at their services, to preach in their pulpits, confirm in their churches or license any assistant clergy. Most reluctantly he had adopted that policy, and if deprivation were the penalty, instead of imprisonment, he should feel bound to proceed to that severe measure. The evil was a standing menace, he said, a source of continual danger and weakness :—

> It is alienating the laity, enraging the masses of our people; it lies at the root of half the difficulties which cluster round the present Education Bill; and it is inflicting untold injury on morality and on religion. At the time when the Church needs more than ever to be at peace within herself, when at home and abroad great doors of usefulness stand wide open, when the work to be done is so vast, so difficult and so far-reaching in its effects, great and terrible is the responsibility of those men who under the name of "obedience to œcumenical usage," which practically means their own rendering and interpretation of Church history, decline to submit to any authority but their own; and who foment strife, stir up the passions of their people, and hamper the work of Christ in his Church by an evasiveness which it is difficult to distinguish from deceit, and by a disobedience which springs from an infatuated self-will.

As an antidote to individualism, the Bishop pleaded for a heartier diocesan spirit, and commended in particular the scheme for the new cathedral as a worthy object for general support. And finally he spoke very earnestly of what was needed to counteract the prevailing materialism of the age.

The clergy must begin with themselves. They as a body must have a higher ideal of life and work. They must take care that the salt did not lose its saltness. The strain upon them was so severe; the round of duties was so excessive; the atmosphere they breathed so deadening that they might become secularised without knowing it. They must all turn back to the first vision and start afresh humbler and renewed men; and that vision was Christ. They must live among their people. They must go in and out of their houses and be accessible at all reasonable hours. By personal acquaintance, by sympathy, by patience they must break down the barrier of shyness and misunderstanding. Pastoral visitation begot confidence and mutual knowledge. Let them cut down their meetings. They were over-organised; they wasted their time and strength in countless speeches and addresses. They must adapt themselves to new circumstances. Their preaching needed adapting. Sometimes it was too academic; sometimes too slipshod and ill-prepared. The people wanted sermons that appealed to heart, and head, and conscience; that came warm and living from the preacher's heart to theirs. Fine language, beautiful imagery, rhetorical flowers, smart and original phrases wearied them. Let them speak to them, whether rich or poor, whether educated or uneducated, as men and women with sins to be forgiven, with sorrows to be faced, with doubts to be solved, with passions to be conquered, with temptations to be met, with death to be faced. Let them preach expository sermons, and sermons that teach. They had floods of exhortation, they needed a little more solid instruction.

The services must be simple, reverent and hearty; and in many churches they were nothing of the kind. They must adapt their methods by throwing ourselves more unreservedly upon the people. They must train them to support the clergy. In some churches the assistant clergy were entirely paid out of the income of the benefice, and the people contributed nothing. That policy was, in his opinion, disastrous. An unworldly clergy, devoted to their ministry, living amongst their people, trusting them, and in a great measure supported by their free-will offerings, worshipping God in spirit and in truth, and preaching to men's hearts and consciences, truths first seasoned in their own experience, was one great remedy for that materialistic spirit.

THE second lecture of Mr. Stopford Brooke's present course at University College, on Thursday week, was largely devoted to Edward Young and his "Night Thoughts," and James Thomson and "The Seasons." Thomson was much the better poet of the two, and although "The Seasons" appeared more than ten years before the "Night Thoughts," Mr. Brooke reserved him for the conclusion of the lecture, and dealt first with Young. The real significance of that pretentious person was not in the value of his poetry, which was very slight, but in the influence it exerted, especially on the Continent, over the leaders of the Romantic school. Young was a swelling rhetorician, who clothed poetic common-places in gorgeous oratorical garments. Now and again there were passages of natural beauty, when he happened to be sincere, but for the most part his work was very shallow and his sentiment was unreal. Yet his moon-light melancholy hit the temper of the time and was the first element of the Romantic movement. "Night Thoughts" was translated into prose and verse on the Continent. Voltaire, indeed, mocked at Young; but Rousseau drew from him support for his own profound melancholy, and Robespierre kept him by his bedside during the Terror!

THOMSON was a Scotchman, and younger by nearly twenty years than Young, had a truer vision, and at least a touch of the faculty divine. He was a true poet, but not a great one, not one of the romantics, but a naturalist; the only trace of mild romance is in the idylls introduced into the "Seasons." Thomson began not only the poetry of natural description of that period, but the poetry of the poor. He knew from his own experience the worth of rustic life, which the fine world welcomed in his poetry only as a new sensation. It is his poetry of direct natural description which gives to Thomson his crowning place. The other poets of that time used Nature as a background for their human subjects; he, like Wordsworth in a profounder sense, cared for Nature for her own sake. That poetry of natural description, arose suddenly in England; Thomson brought it with him from Scotland, where it was at home, and in Henryson and Dunbar had flourished at the close of the fifteenth and early in the sixteenth centuries. Its love of wild Nature for its own sake was a child of the Celtic spirit. The great fault of the Scottish poets of nature was that they did not compose their landscapes as a whole, or give to them any deep spiritual meaning. That was left to the later English poets.

THE October Edinburgh Review is the centenary number, issued in the same style and by the same publishers (Longmans) as the first number. It opens with an extremely interesting historical article, with portraits of successive editors, telling of the foundation and the fortunes of this, the first of the great quarterlies. Sydney Smith, it seems, was the projector of the Review, and edited the first number, after which Francis Jeffrey took it up, and remained the editor until 1829. Brougham also was one of the young men who joined in the project. They were by no means sanguine of the result, but the first number, which appeared Oct. 10, 1802, was at once an astonishing success. Seven hundred and fifty copies were printed in the first instance, but edition after edition was called for, and the Review gained a book value, so that a tenth edition of Vol. I. was issued in 1814, and a seventh edition of Vols. II. and III. in 1814 and 1815 respectively. In 1814 the circulation had reached 12,000 copies a quarter, and three years later 13,500, the highest ever reached. It was in November, 1814, that Jeffrey's famous review of Wordsworth's "Excursion" appeared, beginning, "This will never do," and in the same number the review of "Waverley." Macaulay's great essays first appeared in the Edinburgh, the "Milton" in August, 1825, and "Bacon" in 1837, which filled 104 pages of the number. Carlyle and Gladstone, Arnold and Stanley, were also numbered among the Edinburgh's contributors. The Quarterly was established in 1809, as a rival to the great Whig organ, and in 1817 Blackwood, but the Edinburgh was nothing daunted, and for a hundred years has held its colours aloft.

IT has long been a problem with teachers how to induce those who are taught to act sensibly without giving them foolish reasons for so doing; how to induce them to refrain from doing ill without making very ill threats to them. The problem seems hardly yet to be solved. A bricklayer, for example, defends his practice (or was it only pretended practice for argument's sake?) of working on Sunday, and says that no doubt the parson "if he had to depend on the weather for his pay would preach a very different sermon." The writer of this note does not wish to encourage working on Sunday, and would like to deprecate any misunderstanding between bricklayers and parsons. But he is not prepared to endorse the lecture read to that man by the Methodist Weekly. "Whether or not the 'parson' would preach differently if he had to depend on the weather for his pay, he would be no Christian man if he did not preach and practise the fourth commandment, which explicitly declares of the Sabbath, 'In it thou shalt do no manner of work.' That commandment is no more to be broken by a bricklayer or a parson than are those others 'Thou shalt not steal' and 'Thou shalt do no murder.' It is God's own word to all mankind, and woe be to the bricklayer, parson or nation which violates it."

Is it true that the Sabbath command stands on an equal level with the precepts against theft and murder? Did the Christ who so intensified the commandments that have to do with men's conduct towards each other also intensify the strictness of the Sabbath command? Did he not openly and repeatedly set it aside? Did he ever guard himself against misunderstanding by announcing the perpetual obligation of that command? As a matter of fact, is not the Sabbath command set aside by the whole Christian community, and another day whose observance is not commanded in the Old Testament or the New observed instead? If working on Sunday is a sin to be compared to theft and murder, ought not the parsons to clear themselves of the guilt of travelling in trains on Sunday, and of reading Monday newspapers (in which a considerable amount of Sunday labour is involved), before they preach very severe sermons to bricklayers? In a word, let us urge right-doing as we are able, but let us not urge it wrongfully.

REFERRING to a passage quoted in last week's article on "A Manuscript Life of Christ of about A.D. 1425":—"In this process of the Gospel, so close touched after the letter, we mown (are able to) note and understand many fair things ghostly for our edification," Mr. G. B. Dalby writes as a North countryman to point out that the word mown or mun, with which from early youth he has been familiar, is used in the sense of must, and that such is the meaning of the word, in the above passage, rather than "are able to." Mr. Dalby adds that a Provincial Dictionary gives mun as thus used in Somerset also.

THE issue of Present Day Papers, we greatly regret to hear, is to cease with the present year. Mr. J. Wilhelm Rowntree, the editor, is obliged to relinquish his task, under medical orders due to a threatened loss of eyesight. Mr. Rowntree is to spend a good part of next year in America, undergoing special treatment, which we trust may save him from that great calamity. Many readers beyond the borders of the Society of Friends will miss Present Day Papers. Happily for those who are accustomed to look for much help and stimulus from the writings of liberal-minded Friends, the British Friend remains in trusted hands.

IN a substantial and well-printed volume of 156 pages Bishop Ferencz has published at Kolozsvar a translation into Hungarian of the greater number of the papers and addresses at the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers, held in London at Whitsuntide last year. The English volume of the Proceedings of the Council has had a very wide circulation, and we congratulate our Hungarian brethren on having secured for their own people so admirable a companion volume. Bishop Ferencz, besides writing an introduction to the volume, has himself translated two of the papers, while among the other translators it is pleasant to recognise the names of so many old students of Manchester College, Kovács, Derzsi, Peterfi, Boros, Varga, Csifó, Gálfi, Löfi, Gál and Józan.

A WESLEY Deaconess Home was opened the other day at Ilkley. The President of the Wesleyan Conference very well remarked that the institution was really a branch of the Home Mission Work.

There was an immense amount of work that, if it were not done by women, would not be done at all, and there was a great deal more work that could be better done by women than by men. There lay the whole history and mystery of Christian work by women in the Church.

It was reported that at the present time there are seventy-five Wesley Deaconesses at work in various parts of the world; of these twenty-four are working in London, fourteen in other places south of the Trent, others in the northern part of this country and abroad.

IN the resignation of the Rev. Dr. Brown of the Bunyan Meeting, Bedford, active Congregationalism loses one of its most prominent leaders. Dr. Brown's pastorate, extending over thirty-eight years, has been full of blessing to the town of Bedford, as well as to the church in which he ministered. It was very fitting that the minister of Bunyan Meeting should become the biographer of the great "Dreamer," and in Dr. Brown all the qualifications unite for that duty —scholarship, enthusiasm, sympathy, and a wide and accurate knowledge of the Puritan movement. Anything about Bunyan and his times that Dr. Brown does not know is not worth knowing. It is said that the days of long pastorates are over, and certainly the pace at which even ministers live in big cities makes the necessity for change more apparent than in other days. Perhaps if Dr. Brown had lived in Birmingham instead of Bedford he would have found the strain too severe for thirty-eight years' continuous service in one church. He is to be congratulated on a quieter sphere of labour, where he could devote himself to the study necessary for writing the life of his great predecessor. Yet Dr. Brown has taken his full share of work in Nonconformity at large, and the esteem in which he and his labours are held may be seen in the fact that his brethren called him to fill the chair of the Congregational Union, the highest post of honour among them. A devoted pastor, an able and earnest preacher, a steadfast worker, a diligent student, Dr. Brown has well earned the rest he desires, and will take with him into his retirement the love and gratitude of a wide circle of friends.

THE circumstances attending Dr. Caleb Scott's retirement from the Principalship of the Lancashire Independent College are more pathetic than in the case of Dr. Brown. A long and honourable period of service in the training of young men for the ministry has been brought to a close by painful illness, aggravated, it would seem, by the somewhat injudicious method by which retirement was suggested. Dr. Scott was something of an old-fashioned scholar, yet with a candid mind, and free from any touch of intolerance towards the newer criticism. For many years the College under his presidency greatly flourished. Of late, however, the scarcity of students has been a source of great anxiety to the authorities—an experience not unknown in other places of ministerial training during recent years. The College has made adequate provision for Dr. Scott's old age, and the Committee are now anxiously considering their future. Amalgamation is in the air, and it is difficult for outsiders to see why Lancashire and Yorkshire should each have its own college when one larger and better equipped institution would at once be more efficient and more economical, and equally serve the legitimate needs of the two counties. But one of the barriers to amalgamation, elsewhere as here, is the desire of local ministers and congregations to have a stock of convenient and inexpensive pulpit supplies at hand.

THE death of the Rev. Hugh Price Hughes is a very serious loss to the Wesleyan body, and to the whole community included in the Evangelical Free Church Council. Born at Carmarthen, in 1847, the grandson of a prominent Wesleyan minister (his father was a surgeon), Mr. Hughes began very early to preach, and his energy and constant vivacity soon gave him a very considerable influence in the denomination; an influence which he still retained, and which might well have lasted for many years to come. Though he sometimes disappointed the more ardent of his own disciples, as with the responsibility of high office upon him he would be likely to do (he was made President of the Conference in 1898), his sympathies on the whole were with the progressives in social, educational and religious matters. He did a great work as editor of the Methodist Times, and in the West Central Mission, which since 1887 has held services in St. James's Hall. He was one of the leaders of the Evangelical Free Church Council movement, and was enthusiastic in praise of its Catechism. Mr. Hughes had attended the meeting of the Christian Conference at Sion College, on Monday afternoon, but on the way home was seized with apoplexy and died soon after, at his house in Taviton-street, Gordon-square.

THE last number of The Pilot, "A Weekly Review of Politics, Literature, and Learning, edited by D. C. Lathbury," was published on Nov. 8. Established nearly three years ago as an organ of the High Church party, The Pilot was very ably edited as a journal "which should give no larger place to ecclesiastical affairs than any other secular paper, but handle them, when they were important enough to demand attention, from the point of view of convinced and liberal High Churchmanship." It was always interesting reading, and we have read with great regret the editor's farewell.

COMPROMISE.

O YOU, whose younger thought was bold
To pierce beyond the sophistries
Of doubtful phrases, and unfold
Truth from our rude Theologies;

Whose healthy laughter spoke the soul
Free from its Maker; strong to scorn
The tyrannies that still control
The pliant; then I held you born

To lead our race a stage above
Its dull dead-level of vague thought
That frets in bonds it dare not prove Weaker than man's awed fancy taught.

Hope showed you shatterer of the shrine
Of our gross idols, to proclaim
The God we worship more divine
Than things men label with his name!

How are the mighty fallen! Racks
Nor swords nor fires had moved the heart
Which meek philosophistic quacks
Have cozened to a traitor's part!

Henceforth false words or stifled thought
Must be your measure; while the few,
Who fight still where their leader fought
But fights no longer, grieve for you.

H. A. R. J.

IF, as is the case, we feel responsibility, are ashamed, are frightened at transgressing the voice of conscience, this implies that there is One to whom we are responsible, before whom we are ashamed, whose claims upon us we fear. If, on doing wrong, we feel the same tearful, brokenhearted sorrow which overwhelms us on hurting a mother; if, on doing right, we enjoy the same sunny serenity of mind, the same soothing, satisfactory delight which follows on our receiving praise from a father, we certainly have within us the image of some person to whom our love and veneration look, in whose smile we find our happiness, for whom we yearn, towards whom we direct our pleadings, in whose anger we are troubled and waste away.

JOHN HENRY NEWMAN.

MOLECULES, ATOMS AND CORPUSCLES.

I.

MOLECULES, atoms and corpuscles are at the present day the letters of the alphabet in which we write our knowledge of Physical Nature. When new phenomena are observed, at once we seek to express them in terms of the motions and actions of the atoms. If a new radiant energy is discovered, we are not content till we can describe it as the disturbance sent out by the clashing of electrified corpuscles against solid bodies. If a new law of solution is put forth, we must show how it would result from the wandering of the atoms of salt among the surrounding crowds of solvent molecules.

Our senses do not directly reveal atomic structures.

Yet to our senses there is no sign of molecule or atom. We feel the steady pressure of a breeze without a thought that the air may be composed of separate little bits hurling themselves against us. We look at a glass of clear water, and it seems absolutely continuous, absolutely filling the space which it occupies in the glass. We run our finger along a plate of polished metal, and it is quite smooth and even to the touch. Even when we beat the metal into a sheet so thin that when we look at it under a microscope we see holes in it, the idea we get is that of a continuous web of metal, with here and there holes and passages in it. But to the imagination of the physicist the air is no more continuous than a swarm of gnats, the water is a pile of grains just as much as a pile of shot or sand, and the metal is a crowd of separate atoms interpenetrated by a continuous web of space. The space is continuous, the atoms are little isolated bits hung in it.

Reasons for imagining the atomic structure.

What are the facts, the actual observations, which lead us to imagine this grained or atomic structure of matter, to imagine a constitution utterly beyond direct verification by the senses?

I should put in the first place the ease with which matter, especially when in the gaseous form, can be extended or compressed. The extension or compression is explained, that is to say, is likened to something already known, if the matter consists of atoms separated by spaces. Compression is then only a forcing together of the atoms, extension only a drawing apart.

Another class of facts which leads us to the atomic hypothesis may be illustrated by the simple experiment of putting some salt into water. At once it begins to melt away, and with a little stirring it is soon all gone. Yet it is still all there, distributed through the water, ready to excite our sense of taste, though not our senses of sight or touch till the water has been evaporated off. We have only to think of the molecules of salt as being somehow induced to part company with one another and made to wander about among the molecules of water, and we can form a picture of the processes of solution and diffusion.

But going beyond such solution to definite chemical combination, the uniformity of composition of any one compound, and the simple ratios in which different elements combine to form different compounds, find a simple explanation on the atomic hypothesis, and, at the same time, direct us how to form that hypothesis. We are to suppose that an element consists of little bits or atoms all exactly alike in weight and form. These atoms are invariable as far as our researches go. Temporary exceptions perhaps occur when electric discharges are taking place, but just now we need not consider these. We know of no case in which the atom of one element has been changed or broken up into that of another element. The hydrogen atom remains a hydrogen atom, the gold atom a gold atom. Chemical compounds, we suppose, are made by grouping different atoms together, each group forming a molecule, and consisting usually of a few atoms. Even in elements the atoms are usually grouped in pairs and trios and so on, to form molecules. Here then we have an explanation of the definite combining proportions of the elements. When we find one volume of oxygen combining with two volumes of nitrogen, we think of each molecule of the compound as containing one atom of oxygen to two of nitrogen. Or we may have one volume of oxygen combining with one volume of nitrogen to form another compound, and each molecule contains one atom of oxygen to one of nitrogen. Or three of oxygen combine with two of nitrogen, three atoms of one with two of the other, and so on. In the series there is no case of what are termed incommensurable ratios. We do not find any case of $\sqrt{2}$ times or π times the original quantity of oxygen combining with two of nitrogen. If we did our atomic explanation would utterly break down. Though some physicists will not have anything to do with atoms or molecules, I am not aware that they have attempted any explanation of facts such as these. They have to be contented with the facts without any explanation.

The use of the atomic hypothesis consists in its explanation of facts evident to the senses.

These examples will serve to show the value of the atomic hypothesis in arranging the account of our observations of nature. But the analogy which I have used in saying that atoms and molecules are the letters of our scientific alphabet may be followed further. Just as in writing, the arrangement of letters is really used to express words and sentences which alone have meaning for our minds, so the atoms and molecules are put together to express facts on a scale large enough to be evident to observation, and it is such facts which alone have meaning for our senses. We do not observe the atoms themselves, but, if they really exist, only the effects of enormous numbers of them. What we see, feel and touch are the words and sentences, nay, even chapters and books of which the atoms are the single letters.

The atomic hypothesis may possibly be replaced.

There is always danger of pushing an illustration too far. But I will risk the danger to bring out another point. We can use different alphabets to express the same words and sentences. We may even dispense with alphabets altogether and use picture-writing. May it not be the same with our atoms and molecules? May not some other hypothesis be equally successful in explaining the actions of matter? This is a question on which I think we should keep an open mind. For generations now we have been accustomed to atomic ideas; we have been brought up to think in terms of atoms, and it is now almost inconceivable to us that any other explanation could serve to describe what we see. But we must remember, after all, that the atom is a hypothesis, and that it is at least possible that some other, as yet unimagined, hypothesis may displace it. We may possibly learn some new form of writing, some shorthand to replace what will then seem our present clumsy longhand. At present we have not the slightest inkling of such a new alphabet, and I confess that it is to me most difficult to suppose even the possibility of giving up the idea of a grained structure of matter, whatever may be the nature of the grains. But this may be due to a bad early training.

Particular forms of atoms which have been imagined.

Even now we may distinguish between the general hypothesis of the existence of atoms, and any particular hypothesis as to their form or structure. Various atomic structures have been imagined. Once they were thought of as little round smooth hard balls, like minute billiard balls, but gifted with forces by which they could pull each other—forces arranged so that they could unite in pairs, trios, and so on. Then came Boscovich's centre of force idea, in which the smooth hard nucleus was removed and the atom was merely the central point of a system of forces directed to the point—an idea to which I believe Lord Kelvin is now strongly inclined. But Lord Kelvin is the author of another hypothesis—the celebrated vortex-ring theory. In this, space is regarded as full of a fluid, and the atoms are merely little ring-shaped whirls of this fluid turning round as an indiarubber ring turns round when you run it along an umbrella stick. The two ends of half such a ring are seen at the surface of a cup of tea when the tip of a teaspoon is drawn through it. The half-ring is spinning below the surface and connects the two little whirlpools.

Then Dr. Larmor has put forth an elastic solid theory in which space is full of a solid elastic jelly, and the atoms are little twists or tweaks in the jelly.

A few years ago Professor J. J. Thomson was led to the hypothesis that whatever the form of the atom may be it is a very complex group of corpuscles, the corpuscles being all alike in all atoms. The different atoms differ only in the number and grouping of these corpuscles. The most remarkable part of this hypothesis is that the atoms are not indestructible, and that single corpuscles may be, and indeed are, knocked off in certain electrical phenomena.

Just lately Professor Osborne Reynolds has brought forward a totally new idea. This time space is filled with little round equal grains, piled very close together like a heap of shot, yet with just room enough to move and jostle one another. These grains, however, are not the atoms, but the interspaces. The atoms are empty spaces where so many shot are missing, gaps or holes in the structure, holes surrounded by the round grains.

Each of these hypotheses will explain some one or more of the properties of matter, and Professor Reynolds claims for his empty hole theory that it will explain more than the rest. For the scoffer there is certainly some support in the multitude of these hypotheses.

General conception of atoms.

Fortunately for many uses of the conception of atoms we need not imagine any definite structure. It is enough to think of the atom as a little system possessing mass, capable of motion, and pulling on its neighbours. We must think of the pull between two atoms as being exceedingly minute when the atoms are any sensible distance apart, but as increasing very rapidly as they come nearer, so much so that when they come quite close they can keep together and form molecules.

We must imagine round each molecule a spherical surface drawn at such a distance that when the spherical surfaces of two molecules touch or intersect the molecules become entangled with each other. The sphere thus drawn is called the sphere of action of a molecule, and when we speak of the size of a molecule we really mean the size of this sphere of action.

Without any further supposition than these it is possible in the case of such a gas as air to find the speed at which the molecules are rushing about, the distance which they travel on the average between collisions with each other, the size of their spheres of action, and the number of molecules in a given space. The results obtained are not perhaps very exact. But granted that molecules exist, and granted that they are producing the effects which we observe, they must have very nearly the speed, size, number, and weight which physicists have calculated.

In another article I will attempt to give some account of the methods by which these results have been obtained.

RURAL EDUCATION IN FRANCE.*

THE Special Reports which have been appearing since 1896 under the authority of the Board of Education and the Directorship of Mr. M. E. Sadler are of great value, and should powerfully stimulate interest and effort in educational matters. They promise to provide a fairly comprehensive account of the educational systems of other countries as well as of our own; they are already a mine of information for all who work in the educational field, whether as teachers or administrators or reformers.

But for the non-specialist (if for no one else), the very voluminousness of these Reports is a grave disadvantage. To him they will not, as they stand, bring any educational light or heat, because he will not read them. The average thoughtful citizen is interested in the points of educational controversy which are uppermost at any given time, but he must have information and principles presented in the most concise and lucid form. There is much for him in the mass of material which is so liberally provided by the Board of Education, but it will not reach him effectively unless someone will extract it and set it forth in a series of small books or pamphlets or chapters of a connected volume, each dealing with a separate part of the educational problem, and dealing with it on the comparative method.

Perhaps the Board of Education itself may legitimately cry off such a task. They furnish the material in bulk, and may reasonably expect others to sift and make it available for particular purposes. What is wanted is, indeed, suggested by the five papers on Modern Language Teaching in Belgium, Holland, and different kinds of schools in Germany. These are contained in Vols. II. and III. of the Special Reports (price together 9s. 5d.), but they are also published separately as a "Sectional Reprint" (price 6½d.), and are thus made far more accessible. This is good. But similar series of cross-sections, so to speak, illustrating the treatment in different countries of some of the larger educational problems would be even more valuable. They would require special preparation and would be more difficult to make, but a skilful compiler could make them almost exclusively from these Reports themselves. And what a boon he would confer! How useful, at the present crisis, for example, would be comparative statements of the experience and practice of other countries in such matters as educational organisation and machinery, modes of dealing with the religious question, technical education, educational aids in the rural problem. At present the information on any one of these points is scattered through many hundreds of pages, and it is not surprising that most of it has been little referred to in recent discussions.

In the case of Volume VII. of the Special Reports voluminousness has a disadvantage of another kind. This volume consists of two papers, which cover to a considerable extent the same educational field, and the shorter is in method and manner the better of the two. It repeats in superior form much of the information of the longer paper, which is put first. Suppose a report by Matthew Arnold had been bound up with and preceded by another! True, there is no writer of Arnold's quality in this case. But the first writer leaves scope for unfavourable contrast by being obscure at critical points (e.g., in explaining educational authorities on p. 19) and by modes of expression which come ill from an educational official and author (e.g., "a violent series of attacks," "alternate subjects" instead of "alternative," and "conferring to," on pp. 143, 140, and 148 respectively) Indeed, the whole of his report needs revising and pruning. But though one longs for a Matthew Arnold to deal with rural education in France at the present day, yet both Mr. Brereton and Mr. Medd have much that is extremely interesting and valuable to say upon it, and the rest of this notice must treat of what they tell.

I cannot do better than act on the idea already thrown out, and select examples of their information as to French solutions of some of the problems now agitating us.

And first the question of organisation and machinery, and especially the question of local authorities. On this subject the following statement by Mr. Medd is very compact.

> The chief local authority in each department is the Departmental Council, consisting of the Préfet (President), the Inspecteur d'Académie (Vice-President), four members of the Conseil Général (or County Council) elected by their colleagues, the director of the male and directress of the female Training Colleges, two male and two female teachers elected respectively by their fellow-teachers, and two Inspectors of Primary Education nominated by the Minister of Public Instruction. The presence of Elementary teachers upon the Council is noteworthy. . . The Council, subject to the approval of the Minister of Public Instruction, determines the number, character, and position of public primary schools of every grade, as well as the number of teachers to be engaged in them. Its other duties are to see to the application of the programmes, methods and rules promulgated by the Central Council at Paris, to organise the medical inspection of the schools, to issue rules as to their internal management, to determine what schools require an assistant teacher, to suspend or dismiss teachers, who have the right, however, of appearing before the Council and of appealing to the Minister. Members of the Departmental Council hold office for three years. Other people interested in education are co-opted as advisory members of the Council, but have no voting power. (P. 248.)

Next follows a lucid account of (among other matters) the distribution of the financial burden, and then we have this:—

> In every Commune there is a School Committee (Commission Scolaire), composed of the Mayor, or his nominee, as President; of one or more Cantonal delegates, according to the number of Cantons included in the Commune, nominated by the Inspector of the Academy; and of members elected by the Municipal Councils in the proportion of one-third of their total number. The Inspector of Primary Instruction for the district is an ex-officio member. The Committee should meet at least once every three months, and any member who fails to attend three consecutive meetings loses his seat. The duties of the Committee are to draw up annually before the commencement of the school year a list of all children from six to thirteen years of age, to enforce the attendance laws and inflict penalties for disobedience to them, and to establish a school fund (caisse d'école).
> This fund is intended to assist poor children to attend school by providing them with warm food in winter, clothes and boots, and for the purchase of school material. The members of the Committee have no right of entry into the schools*, they may not interfere with the character or methods of instruction, nor have they any control over the schools or the teachers. (P. 249.)

There are points involved in the former of these passages which are not explained by either author as fully as they should be—such as the mode of appointment of the Préfet, who is the chief magistrate of the Department, and of the Academy Inspector, who is an official of the District University (there being sixteen Universities, formerly "Academies"). Yet we see clearly the general lines on which the local educational authorities are constructed, and how very different they are from ours. The central authority also differs from ours in a very remarkable way.

A sort of consultative committee for all grades of education assists the Minister. Such a council naturally makes for the one-

* "Special Reports on Educational Subjects." Vol. 7: Rural Education in France. Eyre and Spottiswoode. Pp. 310. 1s. 4d.

* There is a strange inconsistency between this and pp. 30 and 31, where it is said that the Mayor may enter at any time, and that cantonal delegates may enter to hear lessons given, and may even address the children.

ness and harmony of education, and thereby prevents the various grades from getting too far apart, as well as insuring against any undue overlapping or local redundancy in the school supply. Of its fifty-seven delegates, six are elected to represent primary education, which is further represented by several official members. (P. 17.)*

The above is a general outline of the authorities which control the primary schools of France. I shall make no attempt to discuss the relative merits of the French and English organisations. I confine myself to pointing out how much material for discussion the Reports contain. It is, of course, necessary to remember that every country has its own history and traditions, and must develop on its own lines; but it is equally true that nations, like individuals, can learn from one another, and that it is a mark of wisdom to recognise what is worth learning. Regarded from this point of view, the following extracts on various points have claims on our attention.

Position of Teachers.—Teachers "are paid direct by the State, and only receive certain allowances and extra grants from the Communes in certain cases." (P. 14.) "The same law which made the payment of the teacher a State affair established a regular scale of salaries for teachers and probationers, dividing them up into six classes." (P. 15.) "Salaries being attached to the person of the teacher and not to any particular school, rural teachers are paid upon the same scale as those in the towns. A teacher may, in fact, be the head of a large school and be in the fifth class with a salary of £40, while another may be head of a small rural school and be in the first class with a salary of £80." (P. 264.)† "The great inequalities in English salaries tend to rob the country of its best teachers, especially as the most valuable posts are in the towns. In France the towns possess but little economic attraction, for salaries are independent of localities. Hence rural teachers are less tempted to desert the country." (P. 141.)

The State and Private Schools.—"The rights of the Minister of Public Instruction in relation to the private and confessional schools are confined to seeing that they are properly staffed, kept in a sanitary state, and conducted in accordance with the law. As has already been pointed out, even teachers in private and religious schools are obliged to possess the brevet de capacité. There is no 'free trade' in teaching." (P. 16.) "It is worth noting that no private school in France can call itself higher primary unless the director or directress hold the brevet supérieur. The abuse of such high-flown terms as Academy, College, High School, &c., by schools whose teaching is purely elementary is impossible in France, where there is a State guarantee attached to every type of school which implies that the teaching provided is in accordance with the title." (P. 36.)

Inspectors.—"In England the primary inspectors are appointed by the President of the Board of Education. In France the inspectors are selected by a system of examination. The conditions of eligibility are so drawn up as to insure a high standard of knowledge on the part of the candidate." (P. 23.)

Training Colleges.—"In 1879 a law was passed compelling every department to maintain a training college for male and female teachers respectively. This law has now been practically carried out, and France possesses to-day, if anything, too many normal colleges." (P. 13.)

Lastly, both papers refer to the "leaving certificate" (certificat d'études primaires), and on the whole with approval. Their remarks should, however, be compared with Sir Joshua Fitch's paper specially devoted to the same subject in Vol. II. of special reports. Fortunately this paper also is in one of the reprints which can be had for a few pence. It treats the leaving-certificate question very comprehensively, and is a powerful plea for the adoption of such a certificate in England.

H. RAWLINGS.

* In Vol. II. of Special Reports, p. 633, it is said that ten representatives of secondary teachers sit on the Committee, but no Report gives a full account of this interesting institution.

† The explanation of this is that promotion to a superior rank is secured by seniority and merit combined, while mere change of station in a school or district may depend upon other conditions, e.g., the death or retirement of other persons.

THE November Seed Sower republishes that excellent sermon of the Rev. Charles Hargrove's on "Our Children," which has already appeared in the Mill Hill Pulpit, and in the same number the Rev. F. K. Freeston begins an illustrated notice of Dr. Martineau's "Life and Letters." In its extended form as the Essex Church Calendar and Seed Sower (2d.) it contains an interesting letter "From the Pew," by a Church member, making some useful suggestions as to the value of advertisement to make known the presence of our churches in the huge London wilderness. There is also a report of the Essex Church "Guild of Fellowship," and a guild paper on "Amusement," by Miss A. J. Lawrence. The Unitarian World, among other interesting matter, has an article on the Education Bill, by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie; "The Organ as a Theological Alternative," by the Rev. A. Webster, who knows what the organ is doing for Scotland; and a translation by Mr. Toyosaki, of Manchester College, of a statement of "The Essentials of Unitarianism," by Professor Jitsumen Saji, of Tokio. In this statement Unitarian at the outset is interpreted in the very broadest sense, for if a man have "the love of God and of man truly in his heart" he is a Unitarian. Yet, after all, "negatively, we oppose and try to destroy the superstitions of orthodox Christianity and other religious systems," and "we are Unitarians, not because we deny Trinitarianism, but because we have accepted the truths declared by reason and confirmed by science. We came to forsake Trinitarianism as a result of our adoption of a larger and truer faith in the relation of God to man." The Christian Freeman and Sunday School Monthly furnishes not only a series of lessons by the Rev. L. J. Jones, but a biographical sketch of Samuel Sharpe, and a somewhat sensational story, "The Director's Dream." Young Days is always delightful for the children. Yr Ymofynydd is in an unknown tongue, but Welshmen know its worth.

HOWEVER perplexed you may at any time become about some question of truth, one refuge and resource is always at hand; you can do something for someone besides yourself.—Merriam.

THE NOEL SOCIETY.

Founded 1892.

PRESIDENT: MRS. HUMPHRY WARD.

SIR,—I should be glad if you will allow me the medium of your columns to make an appeal on behalf of the above Society. The children of the East End spend their childhood doll-less and toy-less. It was to remedy this that the Noel Society was started ten years ago, acting as a veritable Father Christmas by providing gifts for these less fortunate children of the city, and the great happiness the gifts created more than repaid the time and money expended on them.

The toys are given of Board-schools and ragged-schools, the teachers always lending valuable assistance in the distributions, little invalids and cripples receiving a large number through the kindness of district nurses, who take the toys to the homes of the sick children, and many weary hours are enlivened by these welcome gifts.

This year toys will be sent to Mrs. Humphry Ward's School for Crippled Children at the Passmore Edwards Institute, and large numbers have been promised to district nurses in Poplar and Board-schools in Limehouse and Shadwell, but appeals for toys are still coming, the teachers writing that "owing to the bad hop season and the turning off of so many dock labourers their children have the most miserable outlook for Christmas, and a grant of toys from the Society would bring great delight to the little ones."

As the demand is so great I have ventured on this appeal for help, toys or the smallest donations being most welcome, and I shall be pleased to forward particulars of the Society upon application.

There are three other centres, viz.—Birmingham, Bradford, and Manchester—for those who live in or near those cities.

K. M. ROBINSON, Hon. Sec.

37, Adair House, Chelsea, S.W.

[At the three local centres of the Noel Society the hon. secretaries are as follows:—

Birmingham: Mrs. Cecil Crosskey, 385, Hagley road.
Bradford: Miss G. B. Jeffery, Oak Mount.
Manchester: Miss L. C. Squier, Stand Lodge, Radcliffe.

From the Manchester Centre the Hon. Treasurer, Miss M. D. Squier, writes to ask for more help from Northern friends, and adds the following particulars:—"Old toys are accepted provided that they are sent in a good state of repair.

"The rules of the Society are very few, and may be summed up as follows:—That each member contribute toys (if new, not exceeding 5d. each in price) or a subscription each year, and that all parcels be sent, carriage paid, to the treasurer not later than Dec. 1. Reports will be sent to anyone interested in the work."—ED. INQ.]

OBITUARY.

MISS ESTLIN.

IT is with a sense of personal bereavement that we record the death of Miss Mary Anne Estlin, which occurred on Nov. 14, at her residence, 36, Upper Belgrave-road, Clifton. Miss Estlin was eighty-two years of age, but "always young for liberty," and her bright and beautiful spirit did not allow one to suspect how far advanced she was in years. We are grateful for the following tribute, which has been sent to us from the Bristol papers :—"Miss Estlin was the only child of the late Mr. John Bishop Estlin, the well-known oculist of Bristol, who married Miss Margaret Bagehot, of Langport, Somerset. Miss Estlin was born in 1820, at her father's residence in Park-street, and had the misfortune to lose her mother two years afterwards. Her training and education then became the subject of earnest solicitude and care of her father, and she owed much to his tender watchfulness and deep religious teaching. He adhered through life to Unitarian views, in which he had been brought up, and his daughter never swerved from that faith, having been a regular attendant in her early days at Lewin's Mead Chapel, and of late years at Oakfield-road Church. She became her father's constant and beloved companion in all his associations, more especially assisting him in his work for the cause of anti-slavery, of which he was a warm and generous supporter. After the terrible rift in her life, consequent on the death of her father in 1855, Miss Estlin removed to Durdham Down, where her delicate health considerably improved, and she gave herself up to carrying out her father's wishes and benevolent views to the utmost of her ability. Her strong intellect and clear perceptions were brought to bear in the working of committees, and at all matters of philanthropy. The Eye Dispensary, in Orchard-street, instituted by her father in 1812, was carefully watched over by her, and she assisted in starting and establishing the Hospital for Women in Berkeley-square. Taking a keen interest in all topics of the day, Miss Estlin spared no personal exertions in forwarding a good object, viewing education as the ground-work of everything, and none but her most intimate friends will ever know the widespread good effected by her unobtrusive kindness in educating destitute girls, or the children of parents in straitened circumstances, to enable them to make their way in the world. With beautiful unselfishness her life was given up to others, her aim being to effect the largest possible amount of good with the means at her command. In politics Miss Estlin was a staunch Liberal, with advanced views, strongly advocating the rights of her own sex, women's suffrage, and all the progressive movements of the times. Firm, though sweet and gentle, warmly sympathetic and lovable, entering into the joys and sorrows, great and small, of those around, with ever ready help and advice, her many friends regarded her with heartfelt devotion, and feel that one has been taken from them who seemed scarcely of this world, and whose place in it, to them, never can be filled."

One word of affectionate and grateful remembrance we must add here. Miss Estlin was a very generous and warm-hearted friend of THE INQUIRER. In a few lines, published in our sixtieth anniversary number, last July, she told of her father's active interest in the founding of this journal, and what he did at a grave crisis to secure its future, and how she herself "followed it through all these sixty years, but never with such entire sympathy as during the last four years." Much more her letter of greeting contained, which we could not publish, but she has left with us a very gracious and inspiring memory.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

THE past summer has been a time for stirring up patriotic feelings, and it has made us all think about England and the English as a nation.

Now autumn brings to each town and city the thought of local affairs. There are elections for the town council that manages the town, and a new mayor is chosen. Most of the public-spirited men who serve their country well make a beginning in patriotism by doing what they can for their own town or their own district.

Do you think there are any ways in which even children can begin to learn patriotism by serving their own town, their own neighbourhood?

If you truly wish to be fit for public work when your opportunity comes, you will be ready, as children, to do something now. It must be something little, of course; for we all have to begin with little things. It is only by first doing the little things that we can learn to do the bigger ones. It is only by learning to be public-spirited in little ways that we shall learn to see what bigger things there are to be done.

You have probably heard already of the little Dutch boy of Haarlem who saved his country from a great disaster by just putting his finger into a hole to stop a leak. Holland is such a low country that they have terrible floods. In some places the canals are at a higher level than the fields, and the water is kept in by high banks or embankments. The boy, coming home from school, or from some errand, saw a tiny stream of water trickling down one of these embankments. He knew that a little leak would soon grow into a big one; he knew that a big leak would wash away the bank altogether, letting the water flood the country round about. It was a lonely place, and no one else was near to help. So he just put his finger into the hole and stood there, holding back the water with his finger. He stayed there hour after hour, till at last he was found cold and stiff and weary, and also very glad that he had been able to hold out till help came.

That was a big opportunity for a child, and may not occur again even in Holland, and it is not the sort of opportunity that is likely to come to any one of you.

But though you may never have the chance of preventing a big disaster, like a flood, there are ways in which you might turn aside a smaller danger.

Did you ever consider what harm might come to somebody from a piece of orange peel on the pavement? And a child may kick that source of danger into the gutter quite as well as a grown-up person, and being nearer the ground is more likely to see it.

It is very tempting in frosty weather to make slides on the way to school; but then somebody, too old to enjoy sliding, may have a serious fall on the slide that it has been such fun to make.

Consideration for others, like many other good things, begins at home, but it does not stop there. Beginning with our own home-folk we have to learn also to be considerate for others even beyond the circle of our friends and acquaintances.

We can never be public-spirited until we learn to consider the anybody whom we may meet, and even the somebodies out of sight whom we do not meet.

You can all learn to be considerate for those who are in what is called the public service, who are doing some work for everybody—for the town. There are the postmen, the people in charge of the post-offices, free libraries, and other public buildings, the conductors of trams and omnibuses.

There is another matter that comes rather nearer to real patriotism, and that is consideration for foreigners. Children are apt to find amusement in what they call the "funny ways" and funny talk of foreigners. They forget that to a foreigner our ways and our talk are just as "funny," and they forget that it is not kind or polite to laugh at strangers. But it is the people out of sight whom it is most difficult to consider.

An empty bottle left about on the grass or in the sand by one child after a picnic may cause a bad hurt to another child another day. And the one who is responsible will probably never know about it.

In the summer time I spend many mornings in a park where the children play. Quarrelling is very rare, and the elder children are generally thoughtful in their care of the little ones. However, they are anything but careful of the park itself. They pluck flowers from the grass and leave them lying about to fade. Still more often they leave their traces behind in untidy papers that have held their lunch. And so they make the park less beautiful for others.

A child who would perhaps willingly give up a seat to another will stand with dirty boots on an empty seat, or even pile it up with sand—forgetting the "somebody" who will want to sit there afterwards.

Have you ever thought about the difference between public and private property? Public buildings and public parks belong to us all, and even a child may take the interest of a part owner, and help to take care of what belongs to all. Children cannot begin too soon to treat public property with respect.

But consideration for the people who make up the public is even more important. I expect that you will, each one of you, be able to think of ways in which you can show consideration for others in the world beyond your own little circle. And the more we can consider these others—their rights, their interests, their needs—even in little things, the more likely we are to be fit for the bigger things later on.

THE MORAL INSTRUCTION LEAGUE.

THE public meeting announced by the Moral Instruction League to be held in the smaller Queen's Hall on Wednesday evening, particulars of which will be found advertised in another column, is to deal with a subject of the utmost importance in connection with our National Education. The object of the meeting is "to urge the Government to introduce Systematic Non-theological Moral Instruction into all State-supported Schools," and somewhat obtrusively at the head of the advertisement, it is declared: "The only Solution of the Religious Difficulty in Education." We say somewhat obtrusively, because such a statement raises an altogether different question. We should doubtless all be agreed that systematic moral instruction, properly given, in elementary schools, would be of the utmost benefit to the children, and through them to the community at large, but we certainly should not be agreed that "non-theological moral instruction" ought to take the place in our schools of religious teaching and religious observance.

The Moral Instruction League, we learn from a letter of Mr. HARROLD JOHNSON, the secretary, to the Daily Chronicle, was founded in 1897, and had for its object :—

> To substitute systematic non-theological moral instruction for the present religious teaching in all State schools, and to make character the chief aim of school life.

This was amended at the last annual meeting in April, and now reads :—

> To introduce systematic non-theological moral instruction into all schools, and to make the formation of character the chief aim of school life.

But the secretary adds that in the opinion of the League such moral instruction will "finally supplant the theological teaching in the schools."

If we began to discuss this opinion we should probably fall out over the distinction between theological and religious teaching, for the vital question, in our view, is whether moral instruction is to be given only from what is called the purely human standpoint without any reference to GOD, and the deeper aspects of moral obligation and the religious life, or whether there shall also be opportunity in the schools for bringing distinctly religious influence to bear upon the children, and they may be taught to feel the deeper significance of duty as, what we believe it is, the foundation of a true religious life for all the children of GOD.

In the advertisement of the Queen's Hall meeting, after the list of speakers, will be found a further list of well-known names of those who are among the supporters of the objects of the meeting. It was of special interest to us, and we believe it will be also to our readers, to know whether that avowed support was given simply to the special object of the meeting, or extended also to the head-line: "The only Solution of the Religious Difficulty in Education." We therefore wrote to Sir JOHN BRUNNER, Lady O'HAGAN, Dr. KLEIN, and the Rev. JOSEPH WOOD, to ask particularly whether in their view our aim in elementary education ought to be what are called "secular" schools, in which no specifically religious instruction or religious observance would be allowed, or whether their approval was given simply to the plea for systematic moral instruction.

To these questions Sir JOHN BRUNNER replied, through his secretary :—

> I am instructed by Sir John Brunner to say that he supports the objects of the advertised meeting of the Moral Instruction League only in so far as systematic moral teaching is concerned, and that he does not hold that "we must really aim at a system of 'Secular' schools without any religious teaching or observance."

Lady O'HAGAN also replied that her approval covered simply the giving of systematic moral instruction, but added this explanation :—

> I hold that the ordinary teacher paid with public money should be absolutely free, and therefore should, while having to give moral instruction, never be asked to give religious instruction, as it is understood in the usual acceptance of the term. Thus only shall we gain approval of our schools by all the rate-payers and tax-payers; thus only shall we render the numerous members of the teaching profession free to follow their own conscientious convictions and shall we cease to manufacture hypocrites and fetter that section of the community. At the same time, I am all in favour of publicly-supported schools being used at stated times for such religious instruction as may be desired by the parents of the children educated in them by special teachers, chosen either directly by the parents or by the ecclesiastical authorities of the denominations to which they belong. At the same time, if preferred, the children of the denominations could, during school hours, receive this instruction in another place, where all their religious emblems would be displayed. What I cannot approve of is the compromise which has been in vogue of a boiled-down biblical and religious instruction supposed to be suited to all tastes. This compromise renders it impossible for Roman Catholic children to be sent to such a school, and is distasteful to many members of other Churches as it is to me.

Dr. KLEIN replied that while not a member of the League, he had written a letter of "general sympathy with systematic non-theological moral instruction in elementary schools." And he adds :—

> It does not seem to follow, from what I said, that I am anxious to banish all religious teaching from the schools; at the same time, I must admit that, after much anxious consideration, I have come to the conclusion—very reluctantly, I own—that the combined efforts of the Denominationalists leave us no alternative. We can only work now for a national system of Elementary Education which will not, indeed, abolish religious instruction, but which will separate it from the ordinary secular instruction by causing the religious instruction to be given at distinct hours in the week, not by the teachers, but by the Churches, such teaching to be selected by the parents. This alone can secure fairness to the teachers and to the tax-payers. At the time time, I feel strongly that mere secular education must be supplemented by moral teaching in the schools, such ethical teaching as is accepted by all Churches and sects and represents the essential ethical content of all theologies. Indeed, I feel that the children of this generation require such moral teaching very much, and we know how that teaching is at present sacrificed, even in Board-schools, to scriptural lessons which are often more intellectual than moral—directly moral—in character. In a case like the present, we are not at liberty to think only of a few schools that we know, where things are satisfactory to us; we must rise to a sense of national duty and support that which alone can secure the essential, i.e., the moral formation of character all over the country.

The Rev. JOSEPH WOOD's reply was as follows :—

> So far as I understand "non-theological moral instruction," it does not shut out a simple religious observance at the opening of school, nor the use of the Bible, or a manual of morals, nor the name of God as the ultimate sanction. In supporting the meeting, which is to urge the Government to include systematic ethics to the code, I by no means pledge myself to the somewhat sounding brass and tinkling cymbal of "the only solution," &c. I can imagine half-a-dozen other solutions. But that systematic moral instruction is sadly needed, I do most heartily believe—and that from a pretty wide experience. In denominational schools ethical teaching is shamefully neglected to make room for Church doctrines, and in Board-schools, while not neglected, it is too often scrappy and quite unsystematic and given the poorest place in the time-table.

We are grateful to our correspondents for the readiness and the great interest of their replies, which we now leave to the consideration of our readers, trusting that the Queen's Hall meeting will receive the attention due to the importance of the subject it is to discuss.

ROSSLYN HILL CHAPEL, HAMPSTEAD.

ON Sunday morning the Rev. Henry Gow entered upon his ministry at Rosslyn Hill Chapel. On entering the chapel he was received in the chancel by the officers of the congregation, and Mr. Walter Baily, chairman of the committee, addressed to him a few words of earnest welcome, and conducted him to the pulpit.

The first words of the service were the address from Dr. Martineau's Ninth Service, and the prayer, beginning,

O God, who art, and wast, and art to come, before whose face the generations rise and pass away; age after age the living seek thee, and find that of thy faithfulness there is no end.

The opening and closing hymns were from Watts and Charles Wesley:

O God, our help in ages past,

and

Lord from whom all blessings flow
Perfecting the Church below!

THE SERMON.

The sermon, from the text of John iv. 38, "Others have laboured, and ye have entered into their labour," recalled the great and beautiful traditions of the congregation, and the teachers in whose words they had been most perfectly embodied. It was good, Mr. Gow said, that they should strengthen themselves for the future by dwelling upon the past, but not so as to make reverence for the past a hindrance to their free growth in the future. To be worthy of those traditions they must follow their own light worthily, and each minister must be himself. Even of Jesus they were not asked to be copyists. Discipleship meant self-expression, not self-annihilation. Through the spirit that was in Jesus they must work out their own salvation, under the conditions of modern life. To follow Jesus meant an increase of individuality and fulness of life. It should give them more faith in freedom, energy of life and perseverance to press on. They must believe in the present, and in God, manifest in this present life. They were so apt to take dull, low views of the present and look to the past with sorrowful regret. But there were the same and perhaps greater difficulties in the past, which were overcome by men who believed in the possibilities of human nature, who bore fearless witness to what they felt to be the truth, with quiet earnest faith in God and confident appeal to the divinity of man.

He then dwelt more fully on the great tradition built up in our churches by Dr. Martineau, Mr. Thom, Dr. Sadler and others, and read passages from their writings, which we will reproduce here, as good for the consideration not of one congregation only, but of all.

From Mr. Thom's sermons on "The Preacher and the Church."

"What is that Religion to the administration of which I am called purely to devote my life, without mixture of other aim? It is simply that religion which consists in a man's opening his spirit to the Divine Spirit; in knowing himself to be a child of God; in having, more and more, the life and peace of a child of God. It is the religion which will take a man out of himself, which will relieve him from low cares by giving him higher cares, the cares that are the upper currents of desire, with which ever mingle the far-off sounds of heaven: a religion which will make him more and more independent of mortal circumstances, if his soul is growing—which in all his needs will give him unmeasured confidence in a God of infinite compassion and holiness—a confidence which no man can have whose own soul is not compassionate and holy.

"Our business here is not with the religion of other men, but with our own—with the religion which is the salvation of the soul, which means the health of the soul; and our only concern with theology, doctrine, or controversy is that no veils may separate us from that God who would draw us to Himself.

"We must here in no way minister to self-importance. True religion is ever, and in all directions, the destruction of that. We must in no way indulge here in much discussion about ourselves, or about our missions — except only as human beings, surrounded by human beings, bound to all the duties and to all the charities of men. . . . God will do great things through us, though for the most part they will be all unknown to us, when He has done great things in us, when we are meek, pure, patient, self-governed, humble through the intensity of our higher life and the loftiness above us, not seeking to make a great place for ourselves, but to be great in faithfulness to the place given us, though we should be but one of the stones placed out of sight in the building of God."

From Dr. Martineau's sermon "Pause and Retrospect."

"Another favourite task with me has been to find some 'soul of goodness in things evil,' not indeed in things morally evil, . . . but in things intellectually wrong." "We have always something to learn, till we have traced the beliefs which we disown and others trust, up to their inmost seat in human nature, and detected what good and holy thing it is, which they poorly struggle to express. This insight gained, we dissent no longer with the heat of a narrow antipathy, but with the quiet of a large sympathy. . . . Thus only can truly deep-souled and Catholic charity be reached."

From Dr. Sadler's "Gloria Patri."

"Whatever may be the deficiencies of our denomination, the present re-examination of the grounds of our faith has only served to renew and strengthen my own conviction that God has entrusted to our Presbyterian forefathers and to us the germ of the Church of the future—namely, a Catholic Christian Spirit, which enables us to sympathise and co-operate with the holiest and best, to learn from the wisest, to worship with the devoutest, and, above all, to drink individually and without restraint at the very fountains of divine truth and life. We do not imagine we have everything to teach our fellow Christians and nothing to learn from them, God forbid! The older and larger a denomination is, the richer ought it to be in thought, experience, and holy example. We need not, however, measure what we give or what we receive; we have only to be faithful to the light within us, and to thank the God and Father of Our Lord Jesus Christ, as the source of all. In pressing forward to that blessed day, when the true unity of Christ's Church on earth shall be attained, no ancient sympathy need be given up. What we have to do is to help others according to our ability, without too much pressing on them our individuality, always remembering that one is our Master, even Christ, and that all we are brethren."

From Mr. Thom's Sermons "The Preacher and the Church."

"I beseech you by this your ministry to aid the feebleness of all human speech, of all spiritual utterance—to take what in itself would be poor, and cold, and bare into the warmth of your sympathies, and give it fulness and meaning. We come to the sanctuary to be a church. . . . The presence of each individual is a confession, an exhortation, a hymn, a prayer. The first condition of an effective church at all rests with you, and only representatively with your minister. And not the presence only, but the character of each of you, the secret habit of your thoughts, the marks of it on your features, on your movements, mysteriously sway us all.

"For myself, I avow that in this place I have ever derived a support, an influence, a direction from minds with some of whom I have had little or no personal communication upon the subjects treated here, and whose spiritual sympathies, the order of their thoughts, the height and depth of their wants, have been conveyed to me, I do not know how. If this were not so, it would be useless for me to be here. If you did not aid me, it would be clear that I was not aiding you. You, and not I, are mainly essential to this church—and, in so far as it is a church at all, what you give is far beyond what you get."

In reading these passages Mr. Gow showed how they bore upon the ideal of congregational life which minister and people together must seek to cherish, and he reminded his hearers also of a sermon of Dr. Herford's in which he showed how their faith was composed of what was common to all Christian Churches, and how behind all differences of doctrine was the substratum of a common faith in God and reverence for Jesus Christ. In concluding his sermon Mr. Gow dwelt on the natural relations of unforced sympathy, which must subsist between them, united in the desire for simpler, nobler human lives, that should rest peacefully on God and bring nearer the coming of His Kingdom. They should be united in their love of that church and its noble traditions, and of the memory of the great and good who had worshipped there; and in a common determination to maintain the church in quiet strength, as an influence for righteousness and truth, and a witness to an earnest and simple faith in God.

The evening sermon was from the text, Numbers xi. 29, "Would God that all the Lord's people were prophets."

LIFE ought not to be a succession of happenings, a matter of outward fortunes, but a cumulative inward growth, and a cumulative power of productivity. Most of the failures of life are due to the want of a real aim; we pursue our course so much by drifting rather than by sailing. Men are so concerned about living that they lose sight of life.—Hugh Black.

PICTURES FROM THE LIFE OF DR. MARTINEAU.

IN the two volumes of the "Life and Letters of James Martineau," which have already been the subject of full notice in these columns, there are matters of the greatest interest on which we have not yet been able to touch, but must now reserve for future consideration. The present article simply gathers together a few of the most vivid pictures, furnished either by letters or the Biographical memoranda.

A College Missionary Society.

In his reminiscences of college days at York, Dr. Martineau tells of a small inner circle of the students (of whom he was one, and his friend John Hugh Worthington another) among whom there prevailed "a spirit of devout and semi-ascetic enthusiasm," which led them among other things to rebel against the "poor rivalries" of contending for the college prizes, and had this further result:—

"While this fervour of spirit animated chiefly the most assiduous students, it rendered the dry life of mere intellectual industry intolerable to them, and impelled them to escape, at least on Sundays, into a higher region of activity and affection. They allied themselves with a venerable man of remarkable force of intellect and character, who for half his life had toiled as an artisan and preached as an apostle, and now, in his old age, needed help in sustaining the village congregations which he had formed. A college missionary society supplied John Mason with a band of youthful co-adjutors, and expended our pent-up zeal in labours which transported us from books to life. In the village of Welburn, almost at the gates of Castle Howard, the society to which we preached so increased that no room was large enough to hold it; and the students managed, during one of their vacations, to collect the means of building a small chapel. Fancying that my engineering experience would enable me to construct anything, they insisted on my acting as architect; and it devolved upon me to draw the plans, and ride over periodically to superintend the work. In one of these visits I met Sydney Smith on the ground, looking at the rising walls. He was incumbent of the parish, and could not regard a new conventicle with favour. On my saying, in the endeavour to parry his good-natured grumbling, that without the chapel the people for whom it was meant would go nowhere, he replied, 'Well, well, it is a pity they won't all come to me; but so long as you only gather and tame my refractory parishioners, I shall look upon you as my curates, to get the people ready for me.'" (Vol. I., pp. 35-36.)

A School Treat.

In the summer of 1844 (the year after the first volume of the "Endeavours after the Christian Life" appeared) the Hope-street School made its annual excursion to Hoylake, at the mouth of the Dee. A contemporary letter from a young member of the congregation furnishes the following picture:—

"We had a steamer lent to us, and although it was rather a strong wind, Mr. and Mrs. Martineau, with five of their children and a good many of the other children, managed to keep up country dances, and Sir Roger de Coverly till we arrived at our destination. . . . We found Mr. Martineau, with many other gentlemen, playing at football, and it was delightful to see with what energy he kicked the ball, as if all the concentrated energy of his body were brought out in every blow. It was quite a sight to see him, with his coat and hat off, and his hair flying wild, dashing about in all directions, as lightly and nimbly as if he had been a boy. I am sure you would have admired him then, almost as much as in his calmer moments, for you would have known then, that whatever he does is in earnest." (Vol. I., p. 73.)

A Holiday Adventure.

In the summer of 1848 the Martineaus began their fifteen months' stay in Germany with a pleasant settlement at Dresden, whence they made a delightful excursion into the hill-country known as Saxon Switzerland. Of that excursion the following episode was a part:—

"The young men, Mr. John Tayler and Mr. Leyson Lewis, my son and I, quitting the party at Hirniskretschen, struck across Lausitz to Reichenbach; whence unfortunately Mr. Lewis was obliged, by a slight attack of illness, to return at once to Dresden. The rest of us, entering the forest and taking the Bohemian glass-works on the way, worked up the western slopes of the Riesengebirge and along their ridge, with one foot, as it were, in Bohemia and the other in Silesia, till we reached the summit at the Schneekoppe. In spite of copious rain in the day, and fresh snow at night, the walk was magnificent, and its hardships added zest to its enjoyment. Stopping midway, drenched to the skin, at a little hospice in the mountains, we were persuaded to strip and hang up our clothes by the stoves to dry. The difficulty was, how meanwhile to dispose of our own persons, especially as we were ravenous, and had no idea of going to bed. But with a blanket and skewer apiece we got under cover, and sat like a party of wild Indians, doing eager justice to the best of Weinsuppe and Forellen." (Vol. I., pp. 182-3.)

In the Highlands.

Their summer holiday in 1862 the Martineaus spent on Little Loch Broom, near Ullapool, on the West Coast of Scotland, and in a letter on Aug. 24 to his friend and colleague, the Rev. John James Tayler, who was at Dresden, Dr. Martineau tells of their arrival and settlement:—

"For a while, in consequence of the Laird's imperfect preparations for our reception, we had a pretty sharp 'struggle for existence.' For want of boats to meet us on our arrival, we were put out of the steamer with all our luggage on the rocks, four or five miles from our destination, where we had to wait till our signals brought us help. The house had neither fuel nor stores; the two servants, finding themselves helpless, ran off without five minutes' warning, and for some days we had to drag in wood from the plantations and cut it up with our own hands, and forage and cook and clean-up by family division of labour. By degrees, however, resources came in; the missing coal-ship arrived; better servants were found; the postman brought us our weekly bread, and the shepherd our half-sheep; and now we live like Highland lairds. The course of our life is even and quiet enough, varied only by the frowning or the tempting skies; the morning spent in study, while the girls are at their sketching or their books or household work; the evening in reading aloud, while a walk is got in at some time between. Now and then, when the mountain-heads show clear against the morning sky, I yield to the young folks' entreaty, pack up my mountain barometer, and start with them for a day's climb to the summit. In the panorama from a Scottish height there is a peculiarity of colouring which to my eye gives it a charm quite unique; a purple in the shadows, and a soft aerial gold in the lights, and tender shifting tints upon the sea, which sunnier climates cannot show." (Vol. I., pp. 399-400.)

Summer Delights.

To his daughter Gertrude Dr. Martineau wrote on July 21, 1875:—

"Your account of the little island of Sark is most winning, and makes me dream of possible summer weeks upon it, if other years are given, and if, in the meanwhile, its charms are not discovered by the flies and midges. It would be something worth living for to find a place where one could really read out of doors, an early romantic hope of mine, which has been buzzed and bitten out of me half a life ago." (Vol. II., p. 84.)

As Old Age Comes.

On his birthday, April 21, 1881, Dr. Martineau wrote from his eldest daughter's home at East Farleigh to Miss Gertrude Martineau:—

"As it is impossible to call in question the almanac and the chronicles, I suppose I must believe myself six years beyond the Psalmist's reckoning of human life. But, so long as it rests upon testimony, like any outside fact, and not upon other experience than that departure of dear ones, which more or less extends through all one's years, it is difficult to realise one's position so near the verge. I fancy that I have a little more to do while here; but I shall not repine if my hand is stayed, and I am sent for to the great colony of forerunners." (Vol. II., p. 85.)

Gathering up the Fragments.

Some of Mr. Thomas Hornblower Gill's birthday greetings to Dr. Martineau were published from time to time in THE INQUIRER, and were collected in the Memorial Number. On Oct. 16, 1890, Dr. Martineau wrote to Mr. Gill from The Polchar:—

"I congratulate you on the unabated flow of your Pierian spring as a true Vates. As becomes my greater longevity, I resign myself rather to the humbler tasks with which life naturally approaches its close. Do you ask what they are? I tell my daughter Gertrude that I am taking a lesson from her last employment of every Saturday's evening twilight. In the avenue from the public lane to my cottage her rake and broom can always be heard, gathering up and clearing away the fallen leaves, and smoothing the horse and wheel tracks from the gravel, in preparation for the restful aspect of the following day. My week's work being over, and the Sabbath drawing nigh, I am similarly betaking myself to the mere sweeping and scraping together of such traces of the working days as I have left littering the path of my feet, and putting them to the test whether perhaps they can be put to further use as leaf-mould for the soil of the future. In other words, I am preparing for publication three or four volumes of scattered and inaccessible writings that have appeared in Reviews or other transient media between 1833 and 1887, and that, duly selected and classified, may seem to retain some elements of interest still. . . . This project has been often pressed upon me; it has supplied me with my chief summer's work." (Vol. II., pp. 170-1.)

After his Ninetieth Birthday.

On April 22, 1895, Dr. Martineau wrote from 35, Gordon-square to his daughter, Mrs. Leyson Lewis:—

"Happy as your presence would have made us, I really believe you would hardly have enjoyed a visit in such a whirlwind as has swept through the hours of the last two or three days; flinging open the house door from morning to night for the reception of persons, letters by the hundred, telegrams by the score, name-cards uncounted, and bouquets or plants enough for a floral exhibition in every sitting-room. It will take me, with your sisters' help, weeks to conquer the correspondence—English, German, and American. The tone of it all is only too sympathetic, and from the most opposite points of the theologic compass." (Vol. II., p. 200.)

The True Fellowship of Spirit.

Acknowledging a birthday greeting, Dr. Martineau wrote, on April 28, 1897, to the Rev. J. Foster, a clergyman of the Church of England:—

"Your generous message of benediction on the completion of my ninety-second year adds a delightful brightness to an anniversary already charged with grave and grateful thought; and most heartily do I thank you for words of sympathetic recognition which rarely pass across a theological interval so wide. So deep is the debt which I owe to the whole Christian literature of faith and piety, and to the holy lives of which it is the expression, that it is a grievous pain to me to be met, as often happens, with words of excommunication; and is correspondingly refreshing to have the welcome accorded to me of a true spiritual fellowship. It is too much to expect in these days that we should melt down our theological differences into a single regula fidei. But I do earnestly wish that, leaving each communion to its own inheritance of doctrine, we could organise ourselves into a federation of Christian Churches, co-operating for common social and spiritual work congenial to all, while leaving undisturbed the usages special to each. Until such an experiment is tried, we shall never know how closely and divinely we are bound together by the undying capacities of Love which make us Sons of God and Brethren to each other." (Vol. II., p. 215.)

TO-MORROW (Sunday) afternoon Vladimir Tchertkoff is to give a lecture, at the Poplar Town Hall, on "The Oppression of the Working Classes," giving glimpses of Russian life in its Religious, Political, and Social aspects. The lecture (to which admission is free) is to begin at 3.30, and will be illustrated by numerous artistic lantern pictures. At the conclusion questions and free discussion will be invited.

THE GUILDS UNION.

PRIZE ESSAY SCHEME.

IN view of the desirability of promoting among the members of our Guilds study of the literature, movements and principles bearing on the culture of the religious life, the development of religious thought, and the growth of our Free Churches, it is proposed to establish a system of Prize Essays on topics announced from time to time by the Guilds Union Committee, and competed for annually, or at other intervals, by members of Guilds affiliated to the Union. The first series of prizes will be awarded for Essays sent in before March 31, 1903. The Committee have selected the following subjects, either or all of which may be taken up by any member of a Guild in connection with the Union.

1. The story of St. Paul.
   See "Life and Travels of St. Paul" (National Society, 2d.); Stalker's "Life of St. Paul" (T. and T. Clark, 1s., chapters iii., v., vi., ix., x.); also Maclear's Class Book of N.T. History (Macmillan, part 2).
2. Richard Baxter.
   See B. Herford's "Story of Religion in England," chapter xxv.; A. Gordon's "Heads of English Unitarian History," pp. 55-101; Dict. National Biography, article Baxter.
3. Hymns and Hymn-writers of the 19th century.
   See Campbell's "Hymns and Hymn Makers," 1s. 6d. (A. and C. Black); V. D. Davis' "Twelve Hymns," &c. (S.S.A., Essax Hall).

Six prizes will be offered in each subject of the value of £1, 15s., 10s., and three of 5s. respectively. The prizes will be given in books selected by the successful writers and approved by the Committee.

The following conditions must be observed:—

1. The Essays must be written on one side of each page only.
2. Any assistance may be given in preparation, but the Essay itself must be the sole work of the candidate and in his own handwriting, and should not exceed 4,000 words in length nor contain less than 1,500.
3. Each Essay must have the writer's name, age, and address, with the name of the Guild to which he belongs inscribed on the back of the last page, and must also be certified by the Secretary or President of the local Guild as the bonâ fide work of the sender.
4. Essays must be sent in to the Secretary of the Guilds Union, Rev. John Ellis, Mansford-street, Bethnal Green, London, E., by not later than March 31, 1903.

Examiners in each subject will be appointed by the Committee, and the results will be declared at the annual meeting of the Guilds Union in Liverpool during the National Conference week.

It is recommended that where possible classes for the study of these subjects be conducted by some competent person. It will be found helpful to supplement the suggested text-books by oral instruction. It is not intended in the Life of St. Paul that his epistles should be discussed.

Nov. 17, 1902.

THE annual meetings of the Scottish Unitarian Association were held last Sunday and Monday, and both in the numbers present and in the interest shown were most successful. We hope to give a report of the proceedings next week.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

THE SOUTH-EASTERN COUNTIES.

AN interesting letter dealing with the London section of the Provincial Assembly has lately appeared in your columns, so that this letter will take you away from the metropolitan atmosphere, thickened with smoke and fog, into the purer air of our country towns and villages. The sphere of the Assembly's operations is fairly wide, including as it does Middlesex, Essex, Berkshire, Surrey, Sussex, Kent, Hertfordshire, Oxfordshire and Buckinghamshire. In some of these counties "Not-subscribing Churches" are non-existent. Some time ago an unsuccessful effort was made to establish a congregation at Watford. There were small congregations at Royston and St. Albans, but these have disappeared. So that in Hertfordshire we are unrepresented, and this is also the case in Buckinghamshire. In these two counties there are no centres of Liberal Religious Thought, although, doubtless, there are many Liberal Religious thinkers who have drifted away from orthodox communities, or who are still associated with them, while rejecting much of the orthodox teaching. We hope the day is not far distant when those who are seeking a rational faith will be able to find in every important town a spiritual home. To bring about this result should inspire us all with a spirit of missionary enthusiasm. I am deeply conscious that we have not an unlimited supply of men and means; but no one who is familiar with our churches can fail to see that there are men of intelligence and power connected with them, and that if they "not only paid the war tax, but enlisted in the ranks," this result might be accomplished. "Would that all the Lord's servants were prophets!" Should not every church have its band of lay-preachers formally appointed and effectively organised for missionary work? Should it not be expected of the leading and more experienced members of our churches that they be prominent in this work? All honour to the few—alas! they are comparatively very few—who thus employ the gifts they are entrusted with already. Many of them do so at the cost of not a little self-denial; some of them at no small sacrifice. But if our churches are to gather any great accessions to their strength and influence, lay-preaching must be more general among us, and our better educated laymen must be ready to lead in it. There are districts in which it may be desirable to form churches, though there may be no prospect of their becoming self-supporting. It may be said that we have already small churches enough, and they are often a weakness and a scandal among us, and serve the purpose of a back-door entrance into our ministry. How to prevent all this is one of the difficulties that confront us in our mission work. The only remedy I believe for this condition of things is that of grouping these non-self-supporting churches and the larger employment of lay-preachers. Small churches, which are generally the greatest sticklers for independency, should not be encouraged to have a minister of their own when they cannot by any possibility hope to raise sufficient to maintain him in a respectable position.

The one event of the year to which all the churches look forward—the gathering of the Clans—has just taken place at Hastings, when a goodly number of delegates were present. The various reports showed that substantial work had been done, and fresh work was contemplated. The report of the Committee appointed to deal with Public Questions was of a very interesting and practical character. It was with regret that the treasurer's resignation was accepted, Mr. Walter Baily having filled the office for several years; but with Mr. John Harrison as the new Treasurer, well known for his business ability and large heartedness, it is felt that the interest of the Assembly will not be allowed to suffer. The new President, the Rev. Frank K. Freeston, who has given so many practical proofs of his attachment to the Assembly, will also be a source of strength in its deliberation and work. The friends at Hastings who entertained the Assembly, have lately renovated their church. The interior is beautifully decorated, and the gallery at the end has been so altered that it can be used as a room for social gatherings and other purposes. The whole cost of this has been defrayed. Under the ministry of the Rev. Gardner Preston the congregation has been largely augmented.

At Reading there has been the addition to the church building of a substantial lecture hall and class-room. This has been accomplished by the energy and devotion of the friends since the resignation of their last minister. They are anxious to clear off the debt still remaining upon it by the end of the year. For this purpose they intend holding a sale of work in December. A little practical sympathy from members of other churches would be appreciated, and may be sent to the Treasurer, Mr. O. A. Shrubsole, Craven-road. The vacancy at Bessell's Green has been filled by the Rev. F. T. Reed, of Colyton. Since his settlement the congregation has improved, and an evening service has been started with satisfactory results. Several week evening lectures on the various aspects of Liberal Religion have been delivered at Sevenoaks in the Public Hall, but the attendances were small. It is not easy to interest people in theological subjects, especially at the close of the day when they are weary and tired with their day's work.

Through failure of health the Rev. Felix Taylor has been compelled to relinquish the pastorate at Tenterden, and take a lengthened period of rest. It was with reluctance that the church gave up the hope of retaining his services. This is one of the churches that do not believe in short pastorates. Only eleven ministers since 1662, when the church was founded! One pastorate extending over a period of seventy-two years, that of Lawrence Holden. Until recently Tenterden was eight miles from any railway station, but now railway communication has directly connected it with the outside world. This quiet country town with its beautiful surroundings presents a promising sphere where steady unobtrusive ministerial work may be done.

The churches of the province which depend largely upon the Assembly for the maintenance of public worship, and the various organisations associated therewith, are not only holding their own, but in some cases making real progress. At Tunbridge Wells the congregation, in spite of losses by removal, is steadily growing. A fund has been started with a view to the erection of a suitable building in which the work of the church may be carried on more efficiently. At present the services are held in the Mechanics' Institute, which is only available on Sundays, so that nothing can be attempted during the week. If any generous spirit should be moved to send a donation towards this fund, the secretary, Miss E. Hobbs, Howard Lodge, will thankfully acknowledge it. Halstead is still doing well. At the harvest service about 200 were present. Special sermons on our distinctive teaching are being delivered during this month and December. These are attracting attention, and several strangers have come to hear what our gospel really is. A distinctive feature of the regular services is a very efficient orchestral band, which leads the singing and plays selections from the great masters in the musical world. The little congregation at Chelmsford, relying almost entirely on the help of lay-preachers, does not intend to allow the lamp of Liberal Religion to be extinguished. In the Kentish village of Northiam, a monthly service is still held. Like most villages it has suffered from the drifting of the rural population to the great centres of life and activity.

The other churches with their pastors have entered upon their winter's work, and each in its own district, separated from each other by miles of distance, is seeking in its own way to advance the kingdom of truth and righteousness. Their position is one of loneliness, cut off from the fellowship of kindred churches, and ignored by churches calling themselves Christian; they are, however, sustained and cheered by the consciousness of an invisible fellowship with thousands who are fighting the same battle to liberate religion from the bonds of traditionalism and ecclesiasticism. The work in which they are engaged is one which requires the exercise of a large amount of patient faith. But believing that God and truth are on their side, although they may be called to stand alone and experience the disappointment of long delays, they do not doubt the final issue.

SALUTARY THOUGHTS.—II.

THE MINISTER'S WIFE.

"WHAT is your idea of your pastoral duties, Mrs. ——?" asked some ladies of a newly-arrived minister's wife. "To take care of the pastor," was the reply.

The ladies were disappointed, as they had expected her to take a wider view of her duty.

There may perhaps be other ministers' wives who have equally mistaken ideas, and for such it may be as well to lay down a few regulations. These may also be found useful to ministers about to marry.

"Oh! my dear," said one lady to another, shaking her head sadly, "our minister did not consider the congregation when he married!"

A suitable wife for a minister is one who will carry out efficiently the following duties:—

1. To teach in the Sunday-school regularly. If she does not teach, she should of course be the superintendent.

2. To take part in the various week-night activities. These will be many if the church is in a healthy condition, and she will have to be out several nights a week during the winter months.

3. To manage the mothers' meetings. This will require some power of organisation and readiness at accounts. The meetings in most places are held weekly.

4. To superintend the Dorcas meetings. This will involve a knowledge of how to cut out garments to please a number of ladies who all hold different opinions on the subject.

5. To manage the charitable clubs.

6. To visit all families in any way connected with the church or the Sunday-school. There may be several hundred families answering to this description, and the minister's wife should be a familiar friend in each of them. If she is remiss about visiting she is usually greeted when she appears with "You're quite a stranger!" She may not know how to reply to this, but presumably it is meant to make her wish to come again soon.

On the subject of how to visit acceptably, a few hints may be given:—

Don't make a point of opening the oven-door and saying, "What have you got for dinner to-day?" A clergyman's wife (orthodox persuasion) habitually did this, and it was not found generally acceptable.

Don't repeat in one house the ill-natured things you have heard said in another.

Don't say anything to anybody that you don't want everybody to know.

Never do anything which would give anybody reason to say, "Oh, she has no tact!"

Finally, here is a rule given by a visitor of much experience:—

Never sit at the bed-head when sick visiting, but face the patient, so that he can see you without screwing his head off.

Some people have been absurd enough to say that for these little duties a minister's wife should receive a salary, so that she might pay someone to take her place at home. Ministers' daughters are sometimes paid for acting as curates, but a minister's wife—never. It ought to be her greatest joy to help her husband. Every congregation knows that. Nor should her work be confined to her own church and people.

7. She should take an active part in the good work done by other ladies in the town or district in which she lives. This will mean taking her place on committees and helping to manage hospitals, schools, and many other useful institutions. If she will also serve as a guardian it will greatly please the congregation. This is not essential, however. Where it has been done the husband has, fortunately, been able to look after the children.

8. It is a frequent reproach to ministers' wives that their homes are not as well kept and comfortable to live in as they ought to be. "Poor Mrs. —— is so very untidy, don't you know, and such a bad manager!"

This is the more unfortunate, as it is manifestly incumbent upon the pastor's wife to keep open house, and be ready at all hours of the day to receive the members of the congregation. All should therefore be in order, and the children in the nursery, not running about the house disturbing the conversation of their elders, as is so often the case. It may cost money to keep a nursemaid, and it is not always easy to set aside a room for a nursery as well as one for a study, but these are insignificant details. It is very important, then, that a minister's wife should be a good housekeeper.

9. She is expected also to know how to dress. It is very disturbing, for instance, if some evening you ask her to dinner to meet your friends and she arrives clad in a high-necked woollen dress. She ought always to be suitably dressed on every occasion. At the same time, extravagance should be discouraged. Mrs. —— had a weakness for new headgear, so the congregation counted her hats, and let her know they were doing so. It is thought she was cured thereby.

The foregoing remarks should be carefully studied, as they may throw some light on the reason why congregations are so often dissatisfied with the minister's wife. It is, of course, generally her fault when they are; but yet there may be something to say for her, since there are two sides to every question.

A lady who is well known for her tireless labours among the London poor once spent a few days with the wife of a Unitarian minister. "My dear," said she, "I could not lead your life." "Why not?" "I should go off my head!"

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Belfast: Stanhope-street.—A Temperance meeting was held at the Mission on Saturday last, Mr. J. G. Slipper in the chair, when addresses were given by Mr. T. Munn and the Rev. R. Lyttle.

Blackpool: South Shore.—On Saturday afternoon, Nov. 15, the foundation-stones of the Hall now being erected at South Shore were laid by Mr. and Mrs. J. R. G. Grundy and Mr. Cuthbert C. Grundy, and commemorative bricks were laid by the Sunday-school scholars. The President of the North Lancashire and Westmorland Unitarian Association (the Rev. H. V. Mills, of Kendal) presided over the ceremony, supported by the Revs. Neander Anderton, B.A. (who offered prayer), David Davis, and Thomas Leyland; Messrs. D. A. Little (Manchester District Sunday School Association), R. Newell (secretary N.L. and W.U.A.), Councillor David Healey (Heywood), and others. At 4.30 tea was served in the Masonic Hall, and an enthusiastic and nteresting meeting was held afterwards, under the chairmanship of Councillor David Healey, when addresses were given by the Revs. H. V. Mills, D. Davis, N. Anderton; and Messrs. Newell, Crompton, Cunliffe, Grundy, Helm, Heywood, and Taylor. The speeches were interspersed with songs, and the whole of the proceedings of the day passed off to the entire satisfaction of all concerned. A beautiful trowel was presented to Mr. and Mrs. J. R. G. Grundy. Letters of apology and good wishes were received from Principal Gordon, the Rev. J. C. Odgers, B.A., and other friends.

Boston.—Last Sunday Spain-lane Chapel was honoured by the presence of the Mayor (Mr. Joseph Cooke) and the Corporation, who, with the congregation, completely filled the chapel. The minister, the Rev. W. Stoddart, B.A., gave an address on "Man—the Citizen," in which he spoke of the duties of citizenship, and traced the growth of political and social progress. He referred to some of the evils of the age, and advocated the study of history. The sermon will be printed verbatim in the local newspaper.

Bury.—The Chesham Unitarian congregation and Sunday-school have issued in a little 3d. pamphlet "A Brief Historical Sketch," in connection with the celebration of the twentieth anniversary of the school, giving a full account of the past efforts and present prospects of the school and congregation.

Chowbent.—The Rev. J. J. Wright, having just concluded a series of Sunday evening lectures on "Heroes of the Better Life," including Tolstoy, R. L. Stevenson, Whitman, and Martineau, began on Sunday last a new course on "Old Truths with Larger Meanings," the first lecture being on "The One-in-Three: The One-in-All." A Martineau class, held in the chapel every Thursday afternoon for young people of the congregation who can attend at that time, has proved a success; and a Channing class on the same evening for another group of young people has naturally proved, by reason of time and subject, more successful still in point of numbers. In these classes the American booklets on "Four Great Leaders"—Channing, Parker, Emerson, and Martineau—in each of which is given a sketch of the man, with great passages selected from his works, are used. They were got through Essex Hall.

Derby.—The Friargate congregation has suffered a serious loss by the death of Councillor John Henry Ottewell, who passed away on Monday week at his residence, West Cottage, Parker-street, at the age of forty-three. The Rev. John Birks, who conducted the funeral service in the chapel, paid a warm tribute to the character of their late friend, and the large attendance in the chapel, and afterwards at the New Cemetery, where the Mayor and borough officials awaited the company, showed in what high regard Mr. Ottewell was held.

Dromore.—On Friday evening, Nov. 14, a Temperance meeting was held in the Unitarian lecture-hall, under the presidency of Mr. John Minnis, J.P., when addresses were given by a deputation from the Temperance Committee of the Association of Irish Non-subscribing Presbyterian and other Free Christians, consisting of the Rev. R. Lyttle, and Messrs. A. M. T. Clelland and Thomas Munn.

Gee Cross.—On Sunday last the new Mayor of Hyde (Alderman Jonathan Bailey), accompanied by the members and officials of the Corporation and a large number of gentlemen of the borough, attended Divine worship at the Hyde Chapel, an impressive sermon being preached by the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, B.A. It is an interesting and significant fact, showing the part which Unitarians have taken in the public life and work of the town, that out of the eleven gentlemen who have occupied the position of Mayor of Hyde since the borough was incorporated in 1881, no fewer than seven have been Unitarians and members of the congregation of Hyde Chapel.

Horsham.—The service on Sunday evening was taken by the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, and on Monday a well-attended social meeting was held in the schoolroom. The delegates, Mr. Tarring and Miss Jessie Kensett, gave reports of the meetings of the Provincial Assembly, and addresses were listened to with much pleasure from the Revs. T. E. M. Edwards and G. Lansdown, to whom, with Mrs. Lansdown, Mr. Martin offered a cordial welcome. During the previous week, Nov. 11, an interesting lecture on "The Story of Prometheus" was given by the Rev. G. B. Stallworthy, of Hindhead, in connection with the Museum Society. The gymnasium has resumed its meetings in the schoolroom, which, with the library, an orchestra, and Band of Mercy meetings, is now occupied almost every night.

Kendal.—A course of five week-night lectures has been organised by the North Lancashire and Westmorland Unitarian Association, to be delivered in the Market-place Chapel, by the Rev. J. Channing Pollard, of Lancaster, on "Man in his Social and Domestic Relationships." Special topics of the weekly lectures, which began on Monday, Nov. 3, were "Man," "Woman," and "Marriage." The course has been well advertised, and in consequence of the good collections taken at each meeting, it is believed that they will be more than self-supporting. The attendance at the first lecture was sixty, and there has been a slight improvement in the attendance at each subsequent meeting. Many strangers have been attracted.

Lancaster.—Under the auspices of the North Lancashire and Westmorland Unitarian Association, a course of lectures has been arranged to be delivered in the Nicholas-street Chapel, Lancaster, on "Religion and Evolution," by the President of the Association, the Rev. Herbert V. Mills, of Kendal. The lectures are delivered once a week on Wednesdays, and began on Nov. 5. About 100 persons were present at the first lecture and 150 at the second, almost one-half being strangers. The collections on both occasions were very satisfactory. The topics to be treated are: I. "The Autobiography of the Earth." II. "New Revelations." III. "The Soul's Awakening." IV. "An Authentic Book of God."

London: Mansford-street.—On Monday evening, Nov. 10, Mr. W. H. Shrubsole, F.G.S., delivered a lecture on "A Holiday Ramble in Hungary" to a large and enthusiastic audience. The lantern pictures from his carefully-selected slides represented to the eye the attractive features of the cities and country towns he visited, and were an evidence of the warm welcome which the "Pink Party" everywhere received. On Sunday evening the congregation were privileged to hear an address by Miss Ilena Györy, a distinguished Hungarian visitor, on "Religious Life in Hungary." Her charm of manner, and fluency of speech as she related the religious history of her people from Pagan times down to the present, made a deep impression on all who heard her. The touching incidents of which she spoke, illustrating the compact between King and people, and the substitution of the religion of love for the religion of fear, since the introduction of Christianity into the country, will serve to recall the main features of an inspiring utterance.

Middlesbrough.—Sunday-school anniversary services were held on Sunday, Nov. 9, when the sermons were preached by the Rev. T. P. Spedding, of Rochdale. Special responsive services and hymns were rendered by the scholars, assisted by the church choir. On the Monday evening a very interesting lecture, entitled "A Visit to the Unitarians of Transylvania," illustrated by beautiful lantern slides, was given by Mr. Spedding. On the Wednesday following the annual school tea and entertainment were held. A most successful and varied programme was gone through. It included a cantata, entitled Happy Hearts, or May's Birthday Party, which was very well rendered by the junior school. This is a very pretty, simple cantata, which superintendents and teachers might like to know of. It contains solos for boys and girls, both grave and gay. Altogether the anniversary celebrations were most successful and encouraging to the workers.

Mossley.—The proceeds of the Sale of Work opened by Alderman Lawton, J.P., on Saturday afternoon, and continued during the evening, amounted to £104. The credit of this success is due to the Sewing Society, assisted by the sewing class, under the management of Mrs. Elliott.

Preston.—The Rev. Herbert V. Mills commenced a course of four lectures on "Evolution" on Thursday, Nov. 13. This is the second course of lectures delivered by Mr. Mills in Preston. The date chosen for the opening lecture was unfortunate, because an audience of 5,000 was expected on the same evening at the large Concert Hall in Preston to hear Kubelik, the violinist; but in spite of this counter-attraction, and the consequent absence of several influential members of the Preston congregation, the Unitarian schoolroom was crowded to the doors, and a "record" collection was made at the close of the lecture, which lasted about an hour and a half. The topics of the lectures in this course are as follows:—I. "The Laws of Nature and the Impulse Behind the Laws." II. "The Evolution of the Physical Body." III. "The Coming of Mind into the Body." IV. "From a Molecule to a Soul." The remainder of the lectures are to be given in the chapel.

Pudsey.—The Rev. Harold Davies, a young minister, who was formerly a Baptist, but for the past two years as a Unitarian had rendered very acceptable services at Pudsey, disappeared last Saturday evening without warning to the congregation, leaving letters at his lodgings, with the brief message: "Gone away from Pudsey for ever. Changed my religious views."

Sale.—The Rev. W. L. Schroeder, M.A., is delivering a course of lectures upon "The Great Religions of the World"; the first address on Sunday evening, Nov. 9 by way of introduction, dealt generally with the science of religion, and was followed by lectures on "Zoroastrianism" and "Confucianism." So far the congregations attending these services have been satisfactory and encouraging. The subjects are evidently of great interest to the people. Subsequent addresses will be on "Buddhism" and "Mohammedanism." On Sunday, the 16th, collections were taken on behalf of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and resulted in a larger collection being obtained than in any previous year.

Stalybridge.—On Saturday last the Sunday-school held a re-union meeting in conjunction with the Parents' Annual Party. There was a large attendance of former and present teachers and scholars. After tea Mr. W. Thompson, senior director, presided over the meeting, and gave a hearty welcome to old friends. The great event of the evening was the presentation of a gold brooch medal to Miss Mary Jane Shepley, bearing on its face an impression of the school, and on the reverse side an inscription saying that it was given by teachers, scholars and friends, to commemorate the twenty-first year of Miss Shepley's success in the examinations. The presentation was made by the Rev. W. Harrison, who told how for all those years Miss Shepley, who earned her living in a Stalybridge cotton-mill, had never failed of success in the examinations of the District Sunday School Association, while for the past ten years, on alternate Sundays, she had also been a teacher. Twenty times she had won honours, and ten times a first-class, having taken thirty-one subjects in all. It was, he thought, a unique record, and that presentation was a mark of their honour not only of her success, but for her devoted Christian work in the school. Miss Shepley also received from Mr. John Chadwick and Mr. J. Wigley, President of the District Association, a presentation of books. Examination certificates to forty-two scholars were also presented, and speeches were made by Mr. J. Jackson and Alderman James Kerfoot, former workers in the school.

Correspondents are requested to note that to be sure of insertion the same week, news must reach the Office by the first post on Thursday at latest, and the earlier in the week the better.

Readers who love thrilling romance will feel under a debt of gratitude to

Mr. FRED M. WHITE

for his New Story,

A Shadowed Love,

which will commence this week in

THE CHRISTIAN WORLD.

The New Story will introduce the readers of this great Religious Weekly to an author who has not yet been represented in its pages. "A Shadowed Love," we believe, will put its readers on very good terms with Mr. Fred M. White. It is a story quite out of the common, with a lovely blind heroine, around whom centres a tragic mystery. A struggling young novelist and journalist, living with his sister in London, renders a great service to the heroine's father, who is haunted by mortal fear of some imminent peril arising out of a dark chapter in his past. Dick Stevenson, scenting a mystery, begins to wonder whether there is material for a novel in it, but he soon finds himself a leading actor in a drama more startling and fuller of thickly crowding surprises than any story he had ever ventured to imagine. Those readers who pride themselves on foreseeing the end of a novel from the beginning will find themselves baffled for once. Mr. Fred M. White knows how to keep his secret, and we anticipate that as the story progresses there will be impatient waiting, after each instalment, for the continuation in tens of thousands of homes As the title implies, the love element is prominent, and the love story told is as fragrant as the favourite violets of the sightless heroine. "A Shadowed Love" is a strong, wholesome romance for tired fathers and mothers, to enable them to shake off the cares of the day during the coming winter evenings, but it may be put without fear into the hands of the younger members of the family.

PRESS OPINIONS.

"The two volumes of 'The Life and Letters of Dr. Martineau,' which we owe to his friends Principal Drummond and Professor Upton, will be prized by all who knew or admired one of the great ethical teachers and one of the purest and noblest figures of our time."—TIMES.

"These volumes intensify, if possible, our admiration for Dr. Martineau's great intellectual powers, his rare skill as a dialectician, his splendid faculty for exposition; but, above all, for a rare sweetness and graciousness of spirit and for a profound insight into the things that matter—those things that transcend time and space, and alone give to human life stability and sanctity."—WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

"A worthy representation of one of the most impressive and gracious figures of the century just closed."—SCOTSMAN.

"The book is one of the most remarkable contributions to biographical literature published within recent years."—DUNDEE COURIER.

"We rejoice to think that it had fallen into such good hands to satisfy the need, and that their mission here has been so fully and so satisfyingly accomplished."—CHRISTIAN WORLD.

"We receive these volumes as a very precious gift. No other book published in our time can affect us quite as this does."—THE INQUIRER.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

A SECOND article by Dr. J. H. Poynting, on "Molecules, Atoms and Corpuscles," will appear in next week's INQUIRER, completing his present consideration of the subject.

THURSDAY next, Dec. 4, is the birthday of Miss Frances Power Cobbe. Born in 1822, she has fought in her long life a good fight. As social and moral reformer and religious teacher, with reverence and profound humanity and passionate earnestness in the later conflicts of her life, her work has been done, while the tender woman's heart has never failed. A multitude of friends near and distant will rejoice that she should now put on her crown of eighty years, and with heartfelt congratulations and good wishes trust that for her at evening-time it shall be light.

IT will be seen from the Croydon item of "News from the Churches" that the Rev. J. Page Hopps has definitely decided to withdraw from his present charge at the end of March, and henceforth to devote himself, as his strength permits, to a "ministry at large." Mr. Hopps is one of those men who certainly will die fighting, and rejoicing in the life which fears no shadow of death. His long course of active service in Birmingham, Sheffield, Dukinfield, Glasgow, Leicester and Croydon, has gained for him a host of friends, who will hear with the utmost sympathy of this decision, and who will hope that in his new freedom they may long continue to hear his stimulating words, and feel the touch of his helpful sympathy.

IN THE INQUIRER of Sept. 3 and 10, 1898, we published two articles under the title "An Earnest Heretic," giving an account of Herr Gottfried Schwarz, of Heidelberg, and a translation of his "Sixty Propositions Against the False Teaching of the Churches." That manifesto, which embodies a revolt against all Church authority, and a declaration of thorough-going Unitarian doctrine, was first published in 1894, and led to Schwarz's enforced retirement (with a small pension) from his ministry in the Church of Baden. In the following year he began at Heidelberg the issue of a little monthly magazine, The Gospel, "for the restoration of the teaching of Jesus," changing its title at the beginning of last year to The Banner of Freedom.

IN this magazine he has carried on a regular exposition of the great truths of Christian teaching from his Unitarian standpoint, and has latterly thrown himself more especially into a vigorous polemic against the Roman Catholic Church. This, we regret to say, has at last brought upon Herr Schwarz the threatened penalties of the law. In the October number of his Banner of Freedom he attacked the sacramental doctrine and practice of the Roman Church as Fetishism, putting on his title-page "The Fetish-worship of the Church," and he has also recently issued a separate pamphlet on "Pope Leo XIII. Before the Judgment Seat of Christ." As a result of these two publications a criminal prosecution has been instituted in the Heidelberg Courts of Justice, on the motion of the Archiepiscopal Ordinariat of Freiburg-in-Baden, and Herr Schwarz is threatened with the penalty of three years' imprisonment.

THE charge against Herr Schwarz is of insulting (Beschimpfung) the Roman Catholic Church, and on the 5th inst. the police visited his house and confiscated the remaining copies of the two offending pamphlets. There is doubtless insult in the suggestion of Fetish-worship, but the writer is a perfectly sincere and single-minded servant of truth, and a man of very earnest religious nature, and it seems incredible to us in this country that he should be made liable by the law to so serious a penalty. The trial is to come on in January, and as we have further particulars of the case, we shall publish them in these columns. We cannot help hoping that there will be friends in this country who would be willing to stand by a fearless heretic in his time of trial, and make some contribution towards a defence fund.

ON Thursday last week, as announced, the closure fell on the Committee stage of the Education Bill, and we have now the text of that amended measure before us. The extent to which it has been altered in Committee may be judged from the fact that, apart from schedules, the Bill came in as consisting of twenty clauses printed on eight pages; it leaves the Committee with twenty-six clauses, and extends to fifteen pages. Some of the most voluminous sections have been pushed through without debate. We should think that there cannot be much joy in the heart of those who, to effect their legislative purposes, have had to drive forward such a Bill in such a way. Surely the subject merited the fullest consideration and the most conciliatory tactics. The Bill undoubtedly may pass, but the harvest of needless trouble, in the schools and out, is equally certain.

ON Friday evening Mr. John Morley, speaking at a dinner in his honour at the National Liberal Club, made special reference to the way in which the Education Bill had been altered, toward the end of the Committee stage, in order to please the "Church." He went so far as to say that "this Bill is regarded by many of those who have themselves supported it in the House of Commons, and by a vast mass of their friends outside, not only with misgiving, but with positive disgust." He proceeded :—

> When we come to this, that the denominational managers are to take a rent for the teachers' houses—though in many cases the teachers' houses were built partly out of public funds; when it comes to this, that these sectarian or denominational managers are to have a share of the endowments of the endowed schools; that they are to have a share—this was last night's enormity—of any fees that may be charged and sanctioned by the Education Board—for these two latter cases the Board of Education is to decide the amount—think of the principle! All these sources of income—fees, endowments, rents for teachers' houses, have been introduced as amendments in the Bill during the last three weeks. Not one of these amendments whose character I have intimated to you was contemplated when the Bill was brought in—and we must regard them as departures, vital departures, from what was understood to be the bargain. National education made the subject of bargains! Such a departure cannot, I think, be defended, and even friends and members of the Church of England must be rather ashamed, I think, of these shabby and pitiful points. But nothing has passed since the Bill was introduced that, so far as I can make out, throws a more lurid light upon the motives that have prompted that Bill, and nothing that is more likely to expose it to the dislike and contempt of the country, including Churchmen.

He quoted with emphatic approval the words of Mr. Beckett, M.P., a supporter of the Government in general politics, but a sharp critic of its education policy—"Some victories are more costly and disastrous than defeat."

MR. MORLEY especially condemned the imposition of theological tests upon teachers, and to show how badly the denominational schools need a flood of adequate teaching power, unfettered by these restrictions, he cited the statement that only about twenty-two per cent. of the teachers engaged at present in those schools have been trained in college. He lamented, as every thoughtful man must lament, the deep cleavage between Church and Dissent that had come about through ill-considered and tyrannical legislation in the past; and he foresaw an extension of the evil from this Bill.

IT "deepens the lines" of separation, "kindles fresh exasperations," and brings "into any number of parishes in England those very lines of division, social, political, and religious, which it ought to have been their first object to try and obliterate." Churchmen might very well decline to listen to him; but one of their own number, Mr. Middlemore, one of the Unionist members for Birmingham, had told them on Thursday night—

He thought the Church would suffer extremely from that form of sharp practice. He thought that the conscience of the country would be pricked, and it would be a very serious thing if the conscience of the man in the street showed itself more sensitive than the conscience of the representatives of the great national Church. It was a serious thing for the Church to juggle and play fast and loose with the nation.

To such weighty words good Churchmen cannot turn a deaf ear.

IT is greatly to be regretted that the Dean of Ripon has apparently no intention of publishing his recent address on "Natural Christianity." To an inquiry and remonstrance from his bishop the Dean has replied:—

My dear Lord,—Since you write to me in the name of the simple-hearted and devout, I readily break through my rule of silence on such an occasion as that which has arisen, and give to them, through you, the assurance you ask for. It seems a strange thing to be supposed to be doubtful about the truths on which I live from day to day, and without which the world would be unmeaning to me. But I gladly give to those whom you represent the assurance that I repeat the creeds (as you say) in a triumphant voice, because they enable me to express daily Christ as God manifest in the flesh, and that I have no other object in life but to take Him into my inmost being, to preach Him as the Saviour of mankind, and to make Him supreme over every part of human life. I shall be truly glad if these few words can have the reassuring effect which you kindly think they may have.—Believe me, ever yours sincerely,

W. H. FREMANTLE.

The Dean therefore declines to maintain before the world that reasonable interpretation of the doctrines of his Church which he laid before the Churchmen's Union.

ON Tuesday the House of Commons considered a new clause which Lord Hugh Cecil proposed on Report to add to the Education Bill. It would allow for separate religious instruction of groups of children in the particular tenets approved by the parents, and for the introduction of outside persons in order to give this instruction. Mr. Balfour admitted the theoretical virtues of this proposition, and declared that he had himself drafted an amendment not substantially different from it, but in view of the enormous friction it would have created if carried, he had not brought it forward. The practical difficulties were so numerous that he could not support Lord Hugh Cecil's proposal; at the same he would not vote against it. After much comment on the deplorable issues that would result from the clause, if accepted, the House found itself freer than the Prime Minister to act on its convictions; and the proposal was rejected by an overwhelming majority. A final effort to preserve the great School Boards as the local education authorities was defeated, as well as a proposal to abolish fees in all public elementary schools. By midnight Clauses 1 to 4 were passed, in accordance with the "guillotine" programme.

THE Methodist newspapers have naturally been very full of appreciation of the Rev. Hugh Price Hughes, whose death has evoked words of admiration and regret in widely separated circles. The President of the National Free Church Council says that the Council owes more to no man than to him. Of his oratory he says:—

He was a ready and skilful speaker. He had large resources, and he had them in instant command. His voice was vibrant and grasped his audience at once and never relaxed its grasp. His words bounded to his lips, and his ringing sentences formed themselves perfectly without an effort. He was adroit in repartee, cunning in fence, could parry dexterously with an opponent, and carry conviction to the hearts of his audience by the torrent of eloquence he poured forth.

On the other hand Archdeacon Sinclair praised Mr. Hughes last Sunday as the strenuous, fearless upholder of truth and justice, the powerful exponent of the Christian thought of a large part of our fellow-countrymen. He added, "How tragic and pathetic to think that when he was so nearly with us he was yet separated by inheritance from us!"

THE British Weekly more than makes up for the ugliness of its portrait of Mr. Hughes by the generous and warm-hearted tribute to him in its leading article.

The Wesleyan Methodist Church has lost one of its most eminent and devoted leaders. But the death is almost the greatest bereavement that could have befallen Nonconformity. Others carry and will continue to carry the banner, but no one can quite take his place. By many years of strenuous and unceasing toil he had gained the ear of England, and upon vast sections of the people he had an unrivalled influence. In the ordinary course of things, he should have been with us to give his fire and counsel for fifteen years more. By the time these years are gone, many issues will be decided. We shall vehemently desire him in the day of battle, but still and always the Leader of faithful souls is with us.

Yet, since we had to lose him, it was better we should lose him so.

Of his theological position the same editor writes:—

Though he was a highly educated man with a civilised mind, the conditions of his life did not leave him free to become a specialist in any department of knowledge. But he knew what was in the air, and he had to handle the problem as it acutely presented itself in life. He knew that it was necessary to face the questions raised by scholars and scientists. He knew also that even if these difficulties can be dispelled, they are apt to be replaced by others deeper and sadder still, which will not yield to argument. He knew that Christianity has to be presented to the age on a purified, simple, and intelligible basis. Mr. Hughes was not a theological or spiritual adventurer. He was not himself, so far as we are aware, troubled by perplexity. Some things were sure to him, and these were enough. He knew very well how one single thought may keep the soul alive for years. He had much sympathy with mystical depth and religious reverie. The essence of Christianity to him was union with the living Christ. His definition of a Christian was based upon this. We remember his saying that he wished to have written on his tombstone the lines—

"Thou, O Christ, art all I want,
More than all in Thee I find."

Under the government of this and other kingly thoughts he himself remained undiscouraged and even blithe through all the confusions.

It is suggested that he had wider thoughts than he felt it wise to speak, and it is noted as a fact that he led his brethren in their decision to retain Professor Beet.

WITH reference to Mr. Dalby's note of last week, the writer of the article on the "MS. Life of Christ," &c., replies that he was familiar with the dialectic mun and its meaning, as given by Mr. Dalby, but that the rendering in the transcript was determined by the authority of the glossary appended to the Oxford reprint (1879) of Wycliffe's and Purvey's New Testament (edited Forshall and Madden), from which he now instances the following references in further illustration. The word is given in the glossary as "Mow, mowe, v. to be able, pl. moun." Luke i. 20. —"And lo! thou schalt be doumbe, and thou shalt not mow speke til in to the dai," &c.; xiii. 24.—"Many seken to entre, and thei schulen not mowe"; xiv. 29.—"Lest after that he hath set the foundement, and mowe not perfourme, alle that seen, begynnen to scorne hym," &c.; Matt. vi. 24.—"Ye moun not serve God and richessis"; ix. 15.—"Whether the sons of the spouse moun morne, as long as the spouse is with hem?" xvi. 4. —"Thanne ye kunne deme the face of hevene, but ye moun not wite the tokenes of tymes"; 2 Cor. xiii. 8.—"For we moun no thing agens treuthe, but for the treuthe."

THE smaller Queen's Hall, in Langham-place, was crowded on Wednesday evening at the public meeting called by the Moral Instruction League. The chair was taken by Mr. Richard Parker, L.C.C., and Mr. Vernon Harcourt proposed the following resolution:—

That seeing that the religious bodies are at variance as to the character of the religious instruction which should be given in the State schools, while most men are agreed that the formation of character should be the chief aim of education, this public meeting calls upon the Government to make provision for the introduction of systematic non-theological moral instruction as a compulsory subject in the curriculum.

This was seconded by Dr. Washington Sullivan, supported by the Rev. J. Page Hopps, Dr. Stanton Coit, and others, and unanimously adopted.

LITERATURE.

JOHN RUSKIN.*

ANOTHER biography of Ruskin was by no means superfluous. There will doubtless be many more. But this is not only a biography; it is a study—thoughtful and candid and sympathetic. It is an appreciation, yet also a criticism. And it was well to have the judgment of one so far removed from Ruskin, in religious and political creed, as Mr. Frederic Harrison. What the Democratic Positivist thought of the Aristocratic Socialist and Biblical Prophet and Artist-Economist was quite worth knowing. We need, perhaps, to be on our guard somewhat when Mr. Harrison claims John Ruskin, in many of his best utterances, for a disciple, however unconsciously, of Auguste Comte. The second article in the Master's credo for the "Companions of St. George," wherein is expressed so great trust in the "nobleness of human nature," is claimed to be "the doctrine only of Positivists, repudiated by most sceptics and agnostics as well as by Christians." (P. 174.) The "crucial truth" of the opening sentence of "Unto this Last," demanding the recognition by political economists of "the influence of social affection," Mr. Harrison says, "had never before been stated so boldly and so dogmatically except by Auguste Comte. . . . But of this Ruskin had never heard; nor would he have put it in any way so systematic (as Comte) if he had heard." (P. 98.) And again:—

I had often to remind him, in public and in private, that most of his social doctrines had been anticipated by Comte. It seems a paradox to mention in the same sentence the most systematic and the most unsystematic of all modern writers, the most scientific with the most metaphysical, the philosopher with the poet, the most organic of modern thinkers with the most anarchic. Comte had never heard of Ruskin, and Ruskin never mentioned Comte, unless in some grotesque parody of what he fancied Comte might have said, though he actually said the contrary. The fact remains that Comte and Ruskin are substantially agreed in their view of Greek poetry and religion, mediæval history, Catholicism, the great poets, in their honour of Dante, of Scott, of Gothic architecture, of Italian art; and also in their disbelief in all that is offered by modern industrialism, by political economy, by the emancipation of women, by democracy, by Parliamentarism, by the dogmatism of scientific hypotheses. (P. 195.)

And after quoting a passage from "Præterita," which he thinks "well expresses the root religion of Ruskin's life," Mr. Harrison says, "Well! that is the essence of the religion of Humanity." All this may be very surprising to many an admirer of Ruskin; and although it may not be quite so true as Mr. Harrison would have us believe, yet his judgment, as a serious student of both writers, is not without interest and significance.

This little volume of not much over 200 pages takes us steadily through the life of Ruskin, giving us the important events of his career, and marking with much clearness and precision the main lines of development, from the home-life of the child-poet to the sad yet peaceful old age—the silent closing years, through which, with energies of mind and body exhausted by labour and sorrow and disappointment, the old man waited quietly for the end. The book gives us in brief the true story of those eighty years; and the study of the man and his impassioned message to his age moves with the story in an ordered sequence of criticism, rising at times into eloquent praise of his genius, yet at other times exposing, with relentless severity, the frailties and extravagances which marred the work of that genius and dimmed the radiance of its light. It is, perhaps, the best introduction to Ruskin that we have, if only we take its judgments as by no means final, and its appreciation, especially of the spirit of the economic Reformer, as by no means full and complete. The Ruskin of those thirty years, from 1855 to 1885, has yet to be reckoned with, and the significance of his appeal to the conscience and the heart still waits to be discovered and felt in the life of a more gracious and merciful and wise humanity. Mr. Harrison has hardly, we think, done justice to that deeper passion of sympathy—that solemn, awful yearning of love for the peaceful and ordered happiness of men, which turned the wealthy and popular art-critic into the lonely and despised Reformer, lavishing his money and wearing out his strength for the deliverance of the toiling masses of the people and the saving for England of all that was purest in her national life, and all that was loveliest in her fields and woods and streams.

Yet this little volume should help to carry us far in the direction of a sober and just estimate of Ruskin's character and work. The account of his early life and education is entirely excellent. One sentence we must quote referring to that stern maternal discipline in Biblical study of which we hear so much in "Præterita" and "Fors."

To this daily reading of the Bible he very justly attributes his power of taking pains and "the best part of his taste in literature." He constantly and most rightly insists on this point. And perhaps only those who from early life have been saturated with the grand music of Scripture can quite understand what a matchless education in language this habit can become to a serious nature and a sensitive ear. (P. 9.)

In days when the reading of the Bible has become so largely a matter of indifference, in many homes, this sentence from the hand of a Positivist may possibly arrest attention.

Of the Oxford days and the Continental journeys and the growing passion for mountain scenery there is much interesting record. Concerning the passage in "Præterita" which describes the youthful emotion on first seeing the Alps from Schaffhausen, one has sometimes heard doubts expressed as to its truthfulness. After being told that such a view cannot be obtained from thence it is pleasant to read Mr. Frederic Harrison's enthusiastic words:—

The present writer remembers his own first view of the Alps from Schaffhausen at the end of a hard day; and after some forty visits to the Alps cannot forget the emotion he felt at the sudden sight, nor can he ever see the eternal snows without a choking sensation in the throat. There is no home sickness, no patriotism, like that of a mountaineer. (P. 38.)

One who felt thus might well appreciate the best that Ruskin has written about the "gates of the hills" and the "mountain glory" and the "mountain gloom," and there is much in this book concerning these, and concerning Ruskin's work in relation to them, that is excellent reading. Mr. Harrison's criticism and appreciation of Ruskin's great books on art may also be commended as a very real contribution to the study of them. He has, of course, a good deal to say both of the greatness and of the defects of that wondrous style in which these are written, and most of it strikes one as singularly just.

The story of the great transitional period of Ruskin's life is faithfully told. The criticism of the "Seven Lamps of Architecture" prepares the way for this. "The 'Lamps' lighted up a new region, and shone across a far wider circle of readers."

It was the studies and the meditation which are embodied in the "Seven Lamps" that first turned John Ruskin from drawings to man, from wall pictures to history and to social institutions, which converted him at last from an æsthetic connoisseur into a moralist who went forth into a scornful world to teach a new gospel of work and a regeneration of the social organism. (P. 62.)

It was his four years' work in the Working Men's College which, bringing him into direct contact with the artisans of London, and with those who were labouring there to brighten and uplift their lives, deepened his sense of the need for some great change in the industrial order of things, and forced him to see that "the life of the body politic was the dominant problem for us all." How Ruskin approached this problem and reckoned with it Mr. Harrison endeavours to show in his seventh and eighth chapters. For his unselfish aim in this, and his noble earnestness of treatment, and his penetrative insight into the heart of the matter, the highest praise is given; there is also some criticism of the attack on Mill and of Ruskin's own more constructive efforts. A few sentences only from the concluding appreciation can be quoted here:—"And now, as we look back across forty years upon these social Utopias which were met with such a storm of anger and ridicule, it is curious to note how many of them are familiar to our age." "His notion that economic prosperity is subordinate to the well-being of the people is the axiom of politicians as of philosophers." "Read all he says as to the necessity of training schools, technical schools, State supervision of practical and physical education, help to the unemployed, provision for the aged, the recovery of waste lands, the qualified ownership of the soil, the reprobation of men who 'would put the filth of tobacco even into the first breeze of a May morning'—read all these glances of a keen and pure soul . . . on a multitude of things social and humane, and you will recognise how truly John Ruskin, forty years ago, was a pioneer of the things which to-day the best spirits of our time so earnestly yearn to see." (Pp. 106-108.)

It were pleasant, if space allowed, to speak of Mr. Harrison's story of the years that followed the great change in Ruskin's career, which took place, as with Dante, "midway upon the road of life . . . where the straight path became confused." It were less pleasant to have room to speak of the defects in style, the badly constructed sentences, the doubtfully just criticisms that sometimes disfigure these excellent pages. Is it fair to say that Ruskin "mocked at the economists from Adam Smith to Henry Sidgwick with no more knowledge of their books than has any æsthetic curate in deacon's orders"? How much knowledge the "æsthetic curate" might possess we are not told; but unless Mr. Harrison knows that Mr. Ruskin had not read the orthodox economists, the sneer is at once pointless and unkind. On page 86, he says that Ruskin "never regarded anything he did or wrote as quite conclusive and sufficient"; on page 95, he speaks of him as one "who opened every written assertion with 'I know'"—sentences which read strangely, side by side. Nor is it quite worthy of so distinguished a writer to speak of the Pre-Raphaelites as the "misguided sect which fancied that art could be regenerated by a decalogue of new conventions," and which "gradually sank into obscurity and public indifference"!

But it has been beautifully said that "we must never leave any man's work with our mind on his faults"; and we will take leave of Mr. Harrison now with a reference to his delightful account of Ruskin as he himself knew him, both in his home at Denmark-hill and as a fellow-worker at the Working Men's College in London. His description of the man and of his beautiful and filial relations with his parents, at the age of forty, is a worthy and sincere tribute of esteem.

His countenance was eminently spirituel—winning, magnetic, and radiant. He was the very mirror of courtesy, with an indescribable charm of spontaneous lovingness. It was neither the old-world graciousness of Mr. Gladstone, nor the stately simplicity of Tourgénieff . . . it was simply the irrepressible bubbling up of a bright nature full to the brim with enthusiasm, chivalry, and affection.

Very striking is the contrast which Mr. Harrison draws between the man, so gentle, courteous, and humble in private life, and the writer, so arrogant and fierce, so vehement in language and fiery in denunciation and merciless in rebuke. All this, from one against whom Ruskin had used some very hard words in controversy, is entirely pleasant and beautiful to read. And alongside it should be placed the sentence which seems to us so profoundly just:—

It must always be remembered that Ruskin was never a political revolutionist; he was a spiritual and moral reformer—his fiercest imprecations dying away into words as tender as those of Jesus when he wept at the sight of Jerusalem.

Fitly, therefore, may the record end, as it does, when the story of the simple village funeral is told, with these quiet words:—

"There was no black about his burying, except what we wore for our own sorrow," says his friend, secretary, and biographer, who has left so fine a tribute, in the Life, to the memory of his master. Let there be no black about our memory of him, say all of us who love a beautiful nature and honour a rare genius.

SHORT NOTICES.

MR. GUSTAV SPILLER says in the preface to his Mind of Man, that in his treatment of the subject "speculation, metaphysical and non-metaphysical, and hypotheses, large and small, have been severely boycotted, their place being taken by a ceaseless and minute experimental examination of the facts." This sort of language is not uncommon in psychological works of second-rate or lower quality. The experienced reader knows what it means, and accordingly is not surprised to find in the middle of this book a chapter in which, in a series of short sections, the author settles to his own satisfaction such problems as those of Mind, Matter, Force, Motion, Freedom, Life, Death, Immortality, &c., and disposes of all "traditional beliefs" on these subjects. The "comprehensive description" of mind is a poor shredded dissection of tatters when compared with the living reality; but as many eminent writers offer us nothing better, perhaps Mr. Spiller can hardly be blamed. (Swan Sonnenschein and Co. 7s. 6d.)

On the Progress of Liberty of Thought during Queen Victoria's Reign is the title of a pamphlet by Constance E. Plumtre which will repay the attention of a careful reader. It is written in an earnest and discriminating mood. Illustrations are given of the prevailing tone of feeling on the subject in the eighteenth century, and upon such a background the course of increasing freedom and mutual respect amongst thinkers of different tendencies is briefly but sufficiently indicated. The author would prefer the title "Agnostic" to describe her own theological position, but it implies in her case a temper and outlook much closer akin to Huxley's than to those of some who have made haste to adopt his epithet. (Watts and Co. 1s.)

The Teacher and the Child is a little book which should be added to the bookshelf of every earnest Sunday-school teacher. Its merits, indeed, entitle it to the consideration of a far wider class, its chapters being, as the author, Mr. H. Thistleton Mark, says, "half-hours of educational theory, addressed mainly to volunteer workers in education, whether in the Sunday-school, the night-school, or in the home, whose business, lying in other directions, leaves them but little time for the study of the principles of education, its methods and processes." When we add that the author is a graduate both of London and Victoria, and that he holds the position of "Master of Method" at the Owens College, Manchester, it will rightly be expected that the book, notwithstanding its modest aim and appearance, is seriously conceived and written. It incorporates a number of lectures, originally delivered in various towns, and afterwards re-written for the National Home Reading Magazine. The first part of the book, which appropriately deals with principles of education arising from a study of the child-mind itself, is of great interest; but the author chiefly deals with precisely the kind of work to be done in our Sunday-schools and other classes. The needs of one learning how to teach are kept distinctly in mind. The author particularly commends Herbart's plan, which may be summarised as follows:—(1) Prepare the minds of the scholars for the subject of the lesson, by evoking knowledge already possessed; (2) stimulate to fresh thought by proposing a problem in some new aspect of things needing to be deciphered and mastered; (3) illustrate and compare, by the aid of the scholars themselves; (4) converge to the "point" or "moral," which they should be now able to find for themselves; (5) give the scholars "something to do" to bring the lesson into practical life. Space forbids of further excursions into the many interesting fields of thought and suggestion here spread out before us. We meet occasionally with points that are highly debatable, but none the less welcome; and on the whole the spirit of the book is most excellent. The repetitions which would blemish a book of another kind are no defect here. It is long since we read a work on this subject with so much pleasure and, we trust, benefit. (Fisher Unwin, 1s. 6d.)

Vision and Authority: or, The Throne of St. Peter. By John Oman, M.A., B.D. Mr. Oman's argument is that the true Church consists of those in every generation who are possessed of spiritual insight: the heavenly vision is always the true ecclesiastical authority. He tries to connect this idea historically with the Blessing of Peter; it was not for his confession that Peter was appointed head of the Church, but for the divine insight that prompted it. The real apostolical succession is accordingly not one of office, but of spirit. In other matters also Mr. Oman has a way of taking things figuratively, and building on the figure rather than on the thing. The first portion of his book seems to us most excellent: here he argues forcibly that neither the evolutionary theory nor recent psychological analysis really involves any weakening in the authority of the spiritual faculties. Mr. Oman's volume deserves a welcome from the catholic-minded for the breadth of its Christianity, and from the lover of English for the graciousness of its style. (Hodder and Stoughton. 7s. 6d.)

RELIGIOUS TEACHING IN SCHOOLS.

THE Guardian has recently published some interesting tables to show how the religious difficulty is dealt with in the public primary schools of other countries. The countries included are, on the Continent of Europe, France, the chief German States, Italy, Austria-Hungary, Switzerland, Holland, and Belgium; the United States of America; and the principal British colonies outside South Africa. In one column is described the character of the religious instruction, in another the provision made for religious minorities, while a third is devoted to local administration and ecclesiastical control. It is only with the first two columns that we concern ourselves at present. The many different schemes which appear in the tables may be classed roughly into four kinds: (1) those which maintain secular education, pure and simple; (2) those which, though based on the secular principle, make some concession to parents who desire dogmatic teaching for the children; (3) those which attempt a system of undenominational religious instruction; (4) those in which the teaching is denominational. It is somewhat surprising to find that of these four classes the first, in which no religious teaching is admitted into the primary schools, is much the most popular; and that the first two, which recognise the principle that religious instruction is no part of the duty of the political State, greatly outnumber the rest. Purely secular teaching obtains in France, in every one of the United States, in New Zealand, and in two of the provinces of Canada (British Columbia and Prince Edward Island). The second class comprises Italy, one of the Swiss cantons (Geneva), three provinces of Canada (Ontario, Nova Scotia, and the N.-W. Territories), three of the Australian colonies (Victoria, Queensland, and South Australia), and British Guiana. The concessions which are made to denominationalists in these countries vary in manner and extent. In Italy, where the only religion contemplated is that of the Roman Church, religious instruction is provided by the commune when parents demand it, but no child is compelled to attend. In Geneva the State makes an annual grant, which is divided between Catholics and Protestants, in aid of the religious teaching of school-children. In Ontario the Paternoster and Bible reading without comment form a part of the school routine every day. Clergymen are permitted to enter the school once a week to give dogmatic instruction, and five families, of either Catholics or Protestants, in districts where they form a minority, may demand and obtain a separate school of their own. In Nova Scotia the curriculum includes "morals and patriotism." Devotional exercises are not illegal, but they must cease as soon as any objection is raised by a parent of any scholar. In the North-West the last half-hour of the school day may be used for denominational teaching; but in places where Catholics and Protestants are both to be found they may form separate "school districts." In Victoria and Queensland religious teaching can only take place in the school after school hours. In South Australia it is forbidden altogether, but Bible reading is permitted. In British Guiana the system is like that of the North-West Territories. The Paternoster and simple Bible reading finds a place in all schools, and religious teaching, from which children may be withdrawn by the parents, is allowed at the beginning or end of the school day.

Various plans of undenominational religious teaching are established in Holland, three of the Swiss cantons, two provinces of Canada, New South Wales, and Tasmania. In Holland it is enacted that "The teacher should carefully abstain from teaching, or doing or allowing to be done, anything whatsoever that may be contrary to the religious opinions of those who profess some form of worship other than his own." It is to be presumed that in this and similar cases the teacher's tenure of his office depends upon his obedience to this injunction. In Basel the religious teaching is to be "historical and non-doctrinal." In Berne "Christianity based on Bible history" may be taught. Much will here depend upon the view which the teacher takes of "Bible history." In Zurich no denominational teaching is allowed for the first six years; in the two remaining years instruction in "Bible history and morals" is given by the clergy; the religious minority, who may presumptively withdraw their children from this course, are permitted to use the school outside school hours for their own religious teaching. In New Brunswick the table of subjects includes "Christian morality"; Catholics, who prefer a more dogmatic kind of teaching, are allowed, in fact, though hardly with the cognisance of the law, to appropriate certain schools. The same practice obtains in Manitoba, where the ordinary religious element in the schools is confined to selected passages of Scripture and certain prescribed forms of prayer. In New South Wales the school time-table includes "general religious teaching as opposed to dogmatic," but ministers are allowed to visit the school once a week to teach those children whose parents desire it, while the rest pursue their "secular" work. "Scripture history" is a code subject in Tasmania, where denominational teachers have the use of the school building after hours. It appears that the only places in the world where undenominational religious teaching is accepted as fully satisfactory are two of the Swiss cantons; for in Holland, where the rule for the public schools is similar, a Government grant is given to official private schools, which are usually sectarian.

In all countries belonging to the fourth class, where denominational teaching is provided by the State, some effort is made to meet the wishes of the religious minority. The least efficient is that of Austria, where all the children in any one school are compelled to attend instruction in the dogmatic tenets of the majority, Catholic or Protestant. The only course for a conscientious objector in a district mainly populated by members of the other communion is to remove, if he can, to another place. In all the other cases the wants of the minority are met either by the provision of separate schools, or of separate religious teaching in the same school. The members of this class, besides Austria, are Prussia, Bavaria, Saxony and Baden, Belgium, Freiburg and St. Gallen in Switzerland, Quebec, and Newfoundland. In Newfoundland, in Saxony, and in the canton of Freiburg, children may be withdrawn from all religious instruction under a conscience clause; and in Saxony a portion of the school fee is remitted in all such cases.

In only two countries, Hungary and our own province of Jamaica, the dual system which is so painfully familiar to ourselves is in operation; and for the same reason—that the Voluntary schools were already in existence when the State turned its attention to primary education. In Hungary the parents of thirty children who object to the teaching at the denominational school may insist on the provision by the local authority of a common school, wherein each religious body instructs its own children. Smaller minorities are protected by a conscience clause. To sum up, the most prevalent methods of solving the religious difficulty throughout the civilised world appear to be these two, in this order: (1) to exclude all religious teaching and exercises from the public primary schools; (2) to permit every denomination to provide, within the ordinary school course, separate instruction for its own children.

STILL through our paltry stir and strife
Glows down the wished Ideal,
And Longing moulds in clay what Life
Carves in the marble Real;
To let the new life in, we know,
Desire must ope the portal;
Perhaps the longing to be so
Helps make the soul immortal.

THE HOUSING PROBLEM.

SIR,—I am reading with great interest the articles written by Mrs. Bosanquet, but the last number I have read as yet is that in your issue of Nov. 8.

The housing of the working classes is a question that has been forced upon me in several capacities during the last forty years. As agent for large capitalists I have had to build many hundreds of houses, and to regulate the sanitation of hundreds more. As a Town Councillor, representing a working-class ward, and as a District Councillor and Poor Law Guardian, many of the problems to be solved have been forced upon my attention. Some of the conclusions at which I have arrived are as follows:—

1. The Royal Commission "on the Housing of the Poor," whose report was published some fifteen years ago or more, made at least one practical suggestion which, if it was adopted, would go very far towards the solution of the problem. This suggestion was that all land should be valued for rating purposes at its actual letting value, as is done with other property, such as shops, factories, mines, railways, &c. Land at present is exempted from this tax.

Thus a field in or near a town may be let for grazing cattle at an annual rental of £2 an acre, and the rates (subject to special rebates and exemptions) will be calculated on that value, although the land might be let on a building lease at an annual rental of from £20 up to, say, £100 an acre. It follows from the present system of rating land that all the improvements, such as waterworks, drainage, new roads, lighting, police, parks, &c., are made at the cost of the owners or tenants of buildings already made. The landowner therefore holds his land till these improvements have been made, and then lets or sells it at a very high price, so that houses must be crowded together in narrow streets, with tiny back-yards or none at all, in order to reduce the rent of land per tenement. This applies to country as well as town. If the rates were charged as recommended by the Royal Commission the landowner would, as a rule, offer his land for building at a much less price (relatively) than he now charges, or let it for building on reasonable terms. Until this alteration in the law of rating is made overcrowding will continue—an unnatural and law-made condition. The Royal Commission contained a number of the most distinguished men of the highest rank, including His Majesty King Edward VII., and in the above recommendation they were almost unanimous, the only two dissentients being Lord Salisbury and Mr. Goschen.

LITTLE PORTLAND STREET CHAPEL.

SIR,—Now that this chapel has been redecorated and restored to its pristine lightness and brightness (mainly by the energy of one of its members) it is a great pleasure to see it again fully occupied, and nearly every seat filled each Sunday by a body of earnest worshippers. The new faces are not drawn from the suburban chapels, but are fresh people who find that these services meet their needs; and a great religious and missionary movement is begun.

It hardly need be said that this inspiration has been aroused by the presence and eloquence of the Rev. Stopford Brooke in the pulpit, a man who can touch the heart of London, and appeal to the religious aspirations of the world; and by his courageous conduct in leaving the prestige and emoluments of the Church of England has set an example which must have its weight and influence with sincere, clear-sighted men and women. He has met the Committee of Little Portland-street Chapel in such a generous, liberal spirit that they can now see their way this year to meeting all liabilities, and are not confronted with the usual deficit, and thus they are looking forward with renewed confidence and hope to the coming year 1903.

M. Lucy Tagart.
Hon. Treasurer of Little Portland-street Chapel.

NORTHIAM.

Sir,—By an obvious slip the writer of the "Provincial Letter" in your last issue put Northiam down as a Kentish village. It is in Sussex, though bordering on Kent, from which county the River Rother divides it. The congregation there seems to have come into Unitarianism by the way of Universalism. In 1802 it was spoken of as the "Universalist Meeting at Northiam." Its condition then may be judged from the return made that year: "At the commencement of 1801 there were thirty-four members; immersed in 1801, two; total, thirty-six." The congregation is called "numerous and attentive" from 100 to 150. The preachers were:—"William Ashby, Stephen Blundell, Robert Cramp, and David Hunisett, none of whom reside at Northiam, but they visit us in rotation."—Universalist Miscellany, 1802.

A CRY OF SOUL-HUNGER.

One who writes as a convert to Unitarianism, and as "an unlearned and insignificant member of the laity," asks our consideration of this significant fact, "that it is far easier for Unitarianism to make converts than to keep them." Converts to our way of thinking, it cannot be doubted, grow more and more numerous. Why then so many vacant places in our churches? The answer is, that it must be because they fail adequately to meet the deepest human needs, and the preaching too often is out of touch with human nature. Thus our convert pleads:—

"How can a man struggling in the grip of some temptation, or at whose heart the canker care is gnawing, turn aside from his own pressing need to contemplate the growth of a 'broader theology,' or interest himself in an abstract 'search after truth'? Most of us have an instinctive consciousness of all essential truths; what we crave is not for someone to tell us more truth, but to tell us how to live up to that which we already know. From the avidity with which the search after truth is pursued, it would almost seem as though truth were some illusive will-o'-the-wisp, for ever receding from us and involving us in a perpetual chase. Yet truth is immutable, and may be easily comprehended of all. The scientist must search long and deep for his facts, but truths are so simple, the humblest and most unlearned may grasp them. Such a truth, for instance, as that it is more blessed to give than to receive is not beyond the intelligence of a little child; though it is beyond his capacity and that of most of his elders always to act in keeping with it. Should not the mission of the pulpit be to attempt to bring conduct into closer relationship to those great, simple, spiritual truths we most of us acknowledge as our ideals?

"If Unitarianism has no higher ambition than to disseminate ideas about religion, to influence thought rather than life, then I see no necessity nor even excuse for the existence of our churches—they minister to no want that is not adequately supplied through literature.

"But it may be argued that intellectual needs are as pressing as what for want of a better term I will call human ones; that mental doubt is as real a torture as grief or anxiety, and ought not to be ignored by the preacher. Yet who that has had any experience of that dread spectre Doubt but knows that only one's self can answer one's own doubts? Each mind must lay for itself its own spectres. For doubt, through its very nature, can never be satisfied; there is only one way of dissipating it—by an act of faith; and to any mind grappling with mental fears that is most helpful which tends to render possible that act of faith. Through what channel does the doubter oftenest find his way into Light? Through subtle reasonings and labyrinths of argument? Or is it not rather through coming into touch with a living human sympathy, whereby he is assured of the existence of its prototype, the divine?

"The aim of public worship should surely be an emotional rather than an intellectual one; otherwise we may as well, so far as any moral elevation is concerned, remain in our own homes. For the emotions are the only channels to the conscience and the heart, and the minister who ignores this fact will never reach either. He may now and again turn a man from this way of thinking to that, but he will never influence the life. He will never, indeed, gain any hearing at all beyond a small circle whose interest in religious matters is purely intellectual."

Yes, indeed, the preacher must be kindled with emotion, and speak heart to heart with his people, if he is to help their deepest needs. Yet while we can well understand this cry of Soul-Hunger, and many a minister may take it to heart, and seek more earnestly, both in his preaching and in the devotion of his services to meet that need, nevertheless the right direction of thought, and the sharing of clear intellectual light (which also may be kindled with Divine ardour) surely has its place in true preaching, and the minister must help the whole of human nature. A new outlook may be given to the doubter, which may be to him a priceless boon, even while the living sympathy of a human heart and the quickening sense of fellowship with others in the communion of the Church are giving him the courage and the faith to accept the more perfect truth.

OBITUARY.

THE REV. JAMES KNAPTON.

In a ripe old age the Rev. James Knapton has been called to his rest. He passed away, in his eighty-fifth year, on Tuesday, Nov. 18, at Hapton, the quiet village in Norfolk where he had been minister for forty-six years. The funeral took place on Saturday last, being conducted by the Rev. Alfred Hall, of Norwich. The service was held in the chapel, and the body was afterwards interred in the adjoining burial-ground.

Mr. Hall, in the course of a short address, said they had all known Mr. Knapton as a genial and kind-hearted man, whose welcome was always sincere and hearty. His liberality of thought had won for him the respect of ministers of other denominations. He had ever refused to distinguish between creeds. His work fitted his character, for he was little inclined to enter into the theological controversies of his time. He loved to live a simple life among village people, teaching them gentleness, forbearance and love. He was a quiet village pastor, known to few, and ministering only to a small community, yet beloved by all to whom he was known. For forty-six years he had been teaching the Christian faith in that district, and he had come to his grave in a full age. He had been called into God's nearer presence, where he would realise more fully that wonderful love of which he spoke to men while on earth.

The Rev. H. J. Bayley, Congregational minister of Long Stratton, has sent to the Eastern Daily Press a tribute to Mr. Knapton, in which, after speaking of his constant friendliness to new-comers into the district, he adds:—

In the way of service in the different places of worship he never spared himself. His earlier years were full of engagements, in which he rendered service in the Established Church, to the Wesleyans and Primitive Methodists, the Baptists and Congregationalists. Even at the recent harvest thanksgiving in the Long Stratton Congregational Church he was one of the welcome visitors. For years the friends at Saham made a point of securing a visit from Mr. Knapton for their autumn festival. One realises that his departure has taken from us one well ripened in the exercise of true kindness.

MRS. HUGH ATKINS.

By the death of Mrs. Hugh Atkins, which took place on the 19th inst., in the sixty-fifth year of her age, the town of Hinckley and the Great Meeting congregation share with her own family in a loss which will long continue to be felt.

Mrs. Atkins was the daughter of the late Mr. William Billson, manager of Parr's Bank, Leicester, and came to Hinckley on her husband's return to his native place, eighteen years ago. From that time until her death she identified herself with all that was best in the life of the town and district. Of a deeply sympathetic nature, she was ever ready to help any good cause or case of individual need. When the local committee of the S.P.C.C. was formed she naturally found a place upon it, and as secretary and collector she rendered the society good service. The Hinckley Cottage Hospital was especially the object of her care, and to her work on the Committee of Management and her unceasing generosity—which have greatly contributed to the present success of the institution—she added a deep interest in the district nursing, which owed much to her personal guidance. It is significant of her interest in this branch of charitable work that she was present at a meeting of the Hospital Committee but two days before the fatal symptoms of her illness began.

From the beginning of her Hinckley life Mrs. Atkins attached herself to the Great Meeting congregation, with growing devotion to the services, and this despite the fact that she had had a life-long association with a large and popular orthodox community. But the ideal of family unity was far more to her than any satisfaction of personal inclination, and, moreover, hers was a spirit that could worship at any shrine. Both morning and evening, as long as health permitted, she was found in her place. She took a deep interest in the young life of the Church—an interest which effectually expressed itself when the School Enlargement Scheme was set afoot. Not only by her purse, but also by her labour in preparation for the several school bazaars, both in her own home and as superintendent of the Sewing Class, she did much to further the success of the undertaking, and the present improvement in the school premises is largely the monument of her presence among us.

The interment took place in the Hinckley Cemetery on Saturday, the 22nd inst., and was preceded by a service in the Great Meeting House. The large congregation was representative of all classes and all religious communities of the town and district. On Sunday morning a memorial service took place, when a large number of relatives and friends again assembled to pay respect to the memory of a good woman.

W. G. P.

THE LATE MISS ESTLIN.

ON Nov. 16, the Sunday following the death—reported in these columns last week—of Miss Estlin, a Memorial Service was held at Oakfield-road Church, Clifton, the place of worship attended by her for thirty years. In the course of his address, the preacher (the Rev. Dr. Warschauer), said that what impressed one first of all on meeting Miss Estlin was the astonishing vigour of her old age, mental as well as physical, her almost youthful alertness of intellect, the undiminished keenness and variety of her interests. But as one was admitted to the privilege of closer acquaintance, another impression grew—an impression not only of a strenuous mind, but of strenuous goodness, of exceptionally noble gifts of heart and character, of a burning zeal for righteousness, of an unflagging interest in every cause of moral and social betterment. Strength and sweetness had been perfectly mingled in a life full of unselfish activities, based upon the religious faith in which she had been nurtured, and which after the fullest and most fearless investigation continued to satisfy her. When they saw it stated that Unitarianism was a form of faith which "slew the Christian consciousness and the Christian energy," they need desire no better refutation than that of pointing to this devout and spiritual nature for whom Christianity was not a creed but a life, while her love for Christ was intensely real. A beautiful life had been crowned by a beautiful death—beautiful in spite of long and severe suffering borne with a sweetness of patience better than stoical, inasmuch as it was Christian. For her, death literally had no terror, no sting whatever; she had looked forward to it with a serenity which half awed those around her. What manner of holy living must have formed the preparation for such holy dying!

Miss Estlin's attachment to Oakfield-road Church had been very great, and she had told him (the preacher) that their meetings for worship formed the greatest pleasure of her life, looked forward to from Sunday to Sunday. To see her in her place morning and evening in all weathers, in spite of her more than eighty years, was to receive a lesson in what it was possible for loyalty and devotion to accomplish. Miss Estlin's fellow-worshippers could not fail to be kindled to higher endeavour and aspiration by the knowledge that the benediction of this noble woman rested upon their Church.

The funeral took place on Nov. 19, the first part of the service being conducted at Lewin's Mead Meeting, the religious home of Miss Estlin's family, by the Rev. Dr. Warschauer, who delivered an address, and afterwards officiated at the graveside. A large attendance of mourners testified to the wide and affectionate esteem in which Miss Estlin was held in her native city.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

This column is some more about being public-spirited, and particularly in school games.

A SOLITARY child may learn how to learn alone, and may learn how to do its best alone. But in working and playing with others we learn new ways of learning and new ways of doing our best. We may play happily alone, but it is only with others that we can learn to play fairly according to the rules of the game, to play generously, taking defeat cheerfully, and rejoicing in the success of another.

The child who thinks "it does not matter" taking a mean advantage in order to win in a little game is on the wrong road, and little things generally lead on further in the same direction. To play fairly always and in every game is the first thing, and it is a very important beginning; it leads on in the right direction to fair play in public matters, both local and national, and to a just sense of national honour.

However much we all like to win, of course, we know that it is not really worth while to win unfairly.

If we play also generously we shall find that better than the pleasure of merely winning is the pleasure of playing together, striving together, learning together to play better, and rejoicing together in the success of the winner.

To play fairly and generously may be learned in games for only two. There are other things to be learned only in games for larger numbers.

It is in school games and in other games for a number that we learn to see the importance of obeying the rules made for the good of all. You can imagine the confusion if each played according to his own rules. For the sake of order we must obey the general rules, however superior we may each think our own rules would be.

Hearty co-operation, that is to say, working heartily together, each taking his part and working in different ways for the general success is one of the delights of such games as cricket. Even fielding, such dull work for beginners, grows interesting when you see how important it is for the success of the game as a whole.

No boy or girl will make a good cricketer who does not put as much effort into fielding as into wicket-keeping or batting or bowling, and who does not consider that fielders have a post of trust just as much as those at the wickets.

To obey the rules, do your best, whatever may be your part in the game, to be loyal to your leader, to care more for the honour of your side than for your own particular score—this is to be public-spirited in games.

Pride in your school and in your class, loyalty to your teachers and your schoolfellows, thought for the honour of your school in work and in play—all this is a good beginning for loyalty to your town and loyalty to England.

It is good to think of these things in connection with school colours or a school badge, just as a national flag and a national badge should remind us of our patriotism.

In no country, I suppose, are games so important a part of school life as in England. And there is no doubt that the English owe many things besides pluck to the discipline of school games.

These higher rules of play that are not written down in any set of rules are part of school tradition in the best schools, and these unwritten rules are part of schoolboy honour.

Girls have the pleasure and benefit of school games now much more than they used to. And they, too, find that there are unwritten as well as written rules of play, and are making their own school traditions. Let these unwritten rules be such that your games may make you public-spirited, as well as strong and straight and healthy.

Perhaps some of you, even amongst the boys, are not keen on school games. But is it not worth while to join, even if you do not at first care much about it?

And whatever you do, it is a mistake to hold aloof through false pride of not doing at all what you think you cannot do well. If you do your best and are ready to learn, you will soon find pleasure in playing together. You can take an interest and a pride in the good play of others, even if you do not win distinction for yourself. Hearty co-operation will give you a real share in the success of all. For in school games, as in national affairs, the many who do their best help a great deal, and are needed just as much as the few who do best of all.

GOSPEL FOR ALL THE WORLD.

THE two Archbishops, who speak on behalf of "the whole Church of England," have appointed to-morrow, which is Advent Sunday, as a day of intercession for a new devotion to Foreign Missions, that the injunction to preach the Gospel "to the uttermost part of the earth" may be fulfilled. It is a noble aspiration, when the Gospel is rightly understood, and it may well appeal not merely to "the whole Church of England" in the Archbishops' sense, but to all religious Englishmen, who together make a far greater whole. But what is this Gospel, and how shall it be preached?

The Archbishops have announced this day of intercession in a letter to the Press, of which we print here the central passages. Speaking of what they regard as CHRIST'S last command to his disciples, they say :—

> That great call has been plainly repeated in these our own days by the sudden and wonderful changes that have been brought about by God's Providence in the new relations which now prevail between the different parts of the great Human Family. During the last hundred years the world has become suddenly smaller. The barriers which have kept nations apart have been broken down. We know our fellow-creatures as we never knew them before. We can reach one another with an ease which a hundred years ago would have been pronounced miraculous. Their laws, their traditions, their customs, their superstitions, have been laid open to our study. And, while our intercourse is thus facilitated, the superiority which the Christian nations possess in knowledge and in power arms us with most powerful weapons for fighting the Lord's battle against ignorance and unbelief. Medical science can be used, and is now increasingly used, as miracles were once used, to prove to those to whom we are sent that we have in our hands a gift from God, which may be made a blessing to man.
> We shall be blind indeed to the lessons thus plainly written in the events our own eyes behold if we cannot read here a signal from the Ruler of all human affairs that the time has come for resolute forward action, and that, as the last century has been the century of preparation, the century now begun ought to be the century of entirely new devotion.

It is true, as the Archbishops say, that the nations of the earth have been brought much nearer together than ever before, and that many barriers not only to actual contact, but to mutual understanding and trust, are broken down. We know our fellow-creatures, as we never knew them before, but in the pride of our superiority we ought not to forget that they also know us. The Archbishops are no doubt right in saying of the nations to whom English missionaries are sent, that "their laws, their traditions, their customs, their superstitions, have been laid open to our study." We could wish that from their eminence the Archbishops had added, "their character and their religion," and had not appeared oblivious of the fact that thoughtful natives, at any rate of India, China, and Japan, have opportunities of studying the "traditions," the "customs," and the "superstitions" of the Church of England. In this day of intercession we should plead for a new spirit not merely of devotion, but of wisdom and humility, in taking the message of Christian love and brotherhood and newness of life to the "heathen" of the world.

The superiority of the Christian nations in knowledge and power is undoubted. These the Archbishops regard as potent weapons in the battle against ignorance and unbelief. But is that the chief battle Christian missionaries have to fight, and are those their chief weapons? Is it not the battle of character that is the most urgent, and is not the chief stress of the conflict not against the ignorant and superstitious native, but against the vicious and infamous of the Christian nations? Apart from the question of superstition (which, however, must by no means be forgotten), what must the clear-sighted of the other nations think of those great Powers, armed with their knowledge and resistless might, who yet themselves are manifestly the slaves of greed and degrading vice? Too often the Christian missionary has appeared in the close companionship of gun-boats, and the infamous "Christian" trader has proved even more eager to push his wares than the missionary to preach his gospel—to create unwholesome tastes, and make his profits in drink or drug, to the destruction, body and soul, of the weak and ignorant, who thus get their first impressions of the superior civilisation of the great world.

Knowledge and power will not win the nations of the earth to the Gospel of CHRIST, nor even the beneficence of modern medical science, truly as it may be described and administered as "a gift from GOD." Justice must go before power, and genuine brotherly love with knowledge, to touch the springs of better life, and persuade the backward races of the world that in Christianity there is the true secret of their happiness and peace. These do indeed go forth with many devoted missionaries, and often persuade, even in spite of the dogmatic teaching to which they are bound. But what is needed now, above all things, in the new order of the world, in the closer contact of nation with nation, is that the Christian nations in their dealings with others should appear in this gracious light, and that Christianity should not be presented, as, for instance, it was recently in China, by the gathered forces of the great Powers.

The Anglican, the Roman Catholic, the Evangelical, each is represented among the missionaries, each with his own conception of the Gospel; but on this Day of Intercession let the prayer be for religious Englishmen, for good citizens, men of integrity and true humanity, men of simple faith, with the "manliness of CHRIST," and unaffected brotherly love; and let such be the men who go out to do the world's work, and represent England, among the nations of the earth. Then will the Gospel be preached indeed, and the missionaries, if the work has first been effectually done in their own country, will have a better heart for their labours in distant lands.

WHY MAINTAIN FREE CHURCHES?

OF the recent Autumnal Conference of the Midland Christian Union at Stourbridge we received at the time no report, but have since had the opportunity of reading the paper by the Rev. RUDOLF DAVIS, on "The Organising Idea of our Churches," which was the subject of discussion at that Conference, and of which the greater part appears in our present issue.

This paper we publish because it represents a view of our Church life which is widely held, and with which we are bound to reckon. With much of its pleading for a strenuous avowal of positive truth and the dissemination of Unitarian teaching, we find ourselves in complete accord, and yet it appears to us that the fundamental principle of our Church life requires a different statement.

Our churches, Mr. DAVIS says, "stand for Unitarianism." That which separates them from other churches is the avowal of certain theological beliefs. Those special beliefs, as indicating a certain type of religion, are the real reason for the existence of the churches. "If these theological beliefs were not held, our churches would not exist."

Such a statement seems to us extremely questionable. It is perfectly true that at the present time we are, as Unitarians, entrusted with a distinct message of religious truth to the world. The great majority, at any rate, of those who belong to our churches are Unitarians. Those churches are the natural religious home for Unitarians, where their religious life can be most fitly nurtured. And it is a trust placed in our hands, to show the vitality of this truth which we maintain, to demonstrate its power in living churches, to quicken true devotion and inspire a noble life. But that is not the same thing as saying that the churches exist for Unitarianism, or that if they ceased to hold their present theological beliefs the reason for their existence would be gone. To say so, appears to us to put the emphasis on the wrong point in defining the purpose for which a church exists, and indeed the history of our churches, where it goes back for more than a hundred years, in itself tells a different tale. Those very churches did exist when the special theological beliefs of our Unitarianism were not held. From generation to generation their religious life has been maintained, while the form of their theological belief has gradually changed, and their universally acknowledged principle is that they are open to fresh change, always open to the light of fresh truth whencesoever it may come, and whithersoever it may lead.

It appears to us, therefore, truer to say that our churches exist simply for worship and the nurture of a genuine religious life. That is their only "creed" or limitation, for that is the essential meaning of a church, and it is the distinctive feature of our churches, that they desire to trust only and absolutely in the living GOD and the freedom of the spirit. That such genuine religious life must be to us now "Unitarian" is, in the strict sense, an accident, though to us of the most vital consequence. Yet the freedom of fellowship is more fundamental as the basis of our Church life than the special form of doctrine.

"Perhaps one in a hundred," Mr. DAVIS says, joins our churches because of the absolute freedom of their fellowship, but practically all are attracted through agreement with the theological teaching that prevails. We should put the proportion higher than one in a hundred. Many, we believe, in these days of unrest, after sore wrestling with old dogmatic claims, have found a religious home with us simply because what they desired above all things was the freedom of an undogmatic fellowship, and that was the natural atmosphere of our Church life, relying not upon unity of theological belief, still less upon any essential "orthodoxy," but upon the attractive power of spiritual sympathy and the practical purposes of the religious life.

The fact that the teaching in those churches is definitely and very earnestly Unitarian, and that in such freedom as ours there naturally comes to be a general agreement as to the broad lines of truth, is no contradiction of the fundamental principle on which the churches rest. That principle, indeed, Mr. DAVIS admits, and strongly urges the importance of their freedom, but he appears to us at the same time to set up limitations which are needless and hurtful to the ideal of a genuinely free fellowship. A missionary society, founded for the promotion of a particular form of theological belief, may indeed rightly refuse the help of its funds to churches which no longer hold that form of belief, but amid the sectarian divisions of Christendom it is a great thing to maintain a union of genuinely free churches, in which, amid diversity of theological beliefs, there shall be a true unity of spirit both in the hour of worship and in the strenuous service of a practical religious life.

THE ORGANISING IDEA OF OUR CHURCHES.*

BY THE REV. RUDOLF DAVIS, B.A.

THERE are in this Midland district certain churches in a certain way, for certain purposes, associated together in the Midland Christian Union. But why do these churches exist? What reason is there for maintaining them? In each town where such a church exists, what does it stand for? Why do not those who worship there, worship in one of the other churches? Why should it exist? What is the organising idea of our churches?

It is Theology that differentiates.

I answer at once, they stand for certain theological doctrines, or forms of faith, different from those of any other church. In religion we may not differ from others. The religion of Unitarian, Catholic, Greek, Evangelical, Jew, Mohamedan and others may be equal. Their adoration of God, their religious emotion and devotion, their self-consecration to the will of God, their work in the cause of righteousness and for the welfare of their fellow-men, may be equal. But religious feeling—worship, adoration, aspiration, praise and penitence—cannot be only felt; it must be thought about; it must become articulate; it must be expressed. It is in these thoughts and their expression that the churches differ—that is to say, in their theological beliefs. There must be thought about God, a conception of Deity, there must be an opinion about the nature and destiny of man, and a belief about the relations existing or possible between man and God. The conception of the object of adoration is theological belief. The adoration is religion. It is in these thoughts, conceptions, beliefs, without which religion has no expression, that differences arise, differences which must in the nature of things always exist and are not to be regretted; what must too often be regretted is the spirit in which adherents of one form of religion regard adherents of another.

The Like-minded Worship best together.

It is, of course, possible to worship upon occasion in any church, or none. But other things equal—that is to say, the officiating minister and the congregation being as religiously minded and devotional there as elsewhere—men can best worship where the theological beliefs held are such as they agree with. It is necessary that men's aspirations, thanksgiving, penitence and adoration shall be expressed in terms with which they are in sympathy. Otherwise some intellectual objection, some critical thought, some obtruding incongruity hinders worship, and the religious faculties of a man's nature are starved—have not, at any rate, their full nourishment. The members of our churches agree in holding certain broad principles of theological doctrine; they have in common certain beliefs which they hold to be truer than those of other churches, and which they find give better expression to their religious natures than those of other churches. This is the real reason for the existence of our churches, they stand for certain theological beliefs: not for their own sake, but because they represent, they are the means of expressing and communicating, a certain type of religion, precious beyond expression to ourselves, and beneficent to the world in proportion as we, as our solemn duty is, make it known. There is, as will be seen, another reason. But that other reason could not exist alone. This, though not complete without the other, can stand alone.

Distinctive Doctrine with Freedom for Growth.

Our churches exist because they hold certain theological beliefs different from those of other churches; if these theological beliefs were not held, our churches would not exist. But since within wide limits there is freedom to the minister to seek and to express what he believes to be the truth, and to the congregation to use very various forms of worship, these theological doctrines are not fixed rigidly and permanently defined; they are not fossilised, they are alive, and they develop into what is the general consensus of belief of the members of the various congregations.

Limits of Freedom.

But there are limits to these changes, and all change is not development. However little it may be used, and with however great reluctance, however wide the limits allowed, there always is, and always must be, some authority limiting freedom of thought in the relations of ministers to people, and in the relations of individual congregations and unions of congregations. Freedom of thought in matters of religion has generally during the last fifty years run on certain fairly well defined lines; it has generally led to beliefs being held similar within limits—but it has not always been so. In religious life there must apparently be occasionally what in plant life are called sports, and the evidence is, since Biblical criticism has arrived where it has arrived, that there will be much greater variety in the future. Freedom of thought in matters of religion may lead a minister to arrive at conclusions disapproved by the bulk of his congregation. He may even feel bound to inculcate opinions which they hold to be pernicious. The members will stay away and the church will languish; or the minister will resign, or (what should never happen) he may have to be asked to go. There is freedom of thought, freedom to express thought, that is, which is the only practical freedom of thought—there is freedom to preach within limits; and no cause for complaint if, these limits passed, authority is exercised. Or, in the case of an aided congregation: if such a congregation came to worship, for instance, a conception of Deity similar to that of the Positivists; or if (as he quite legitimately might) a minister gradually changed his views, so that he worshipped and preached the Triune God, or Jesus as Deity; and if, as quite well might happen with some of our congregations under a powerful personality, he carried his congregation with him, then the withdrawal of aid would be right, and there would be no cause for complaint. We should not tell minister and congregation that they were going to perdition; we should not upbraid them; we should wish them well; we should respect and honour such a church in proportion as it showed itself composed of reverent and sincere men and women, earnestly endeavouring to do their work in the world, as in the same way we respect and honour every church whatever its theological teaching; but we should say "The funds of the Union are not meant for the support of teaching contradictory to Unitarianism, teaching which we hold to be erroneous and injurious; we are sorry, but now that your theological belief has changed, help must be sought elsewhere and from those who are in sympathy with your teaching." There is freedom of thought, but it is within limits.

This matter of freedom of thought has been exaggerated. Carefully it should be guarded, assiduously it should be cherished within the limits possible. But real freedom in matters of religion is absolute: it is either freedom or it is not freedom. Practically, then, freedom is impossible. It is a question of degree. We may have wider liberty of thought and expression than other churches, but our freedom also is necessarily limited. The Churchman, the Wesleyan, the Baptist, the Presbyterian passing beyond certain limits in the expression of theological opinion is tried for heresy, and, if he does not explain away or retract, he has to leave that church unless the church gives way or lets things slide. How is it with us? If a teacher among us changes his views, so that they become more in harmony with those of another church, he transfers his allegiance; if he does not, and he does not carry his congregation with him, he must follow some other calling. We have no infallible authority, church, book or conference; but there is and must be authority; our freedom of thought is not and cannot be absolute. It is more freedom and less authority. Not all freedom and no authority. We have freedom to seek the truth. But if this free seeking lead to strange finding, the consequences are serious to many a man. And they must be. He has no ground for complaint.

Freedom is not Everything.

In another, and more serious way, freedom of thought, the free seeking of truth, has been exaggerated among us. It is spoken of as though it were the life of our churches. That is not so. It is rather the atmosphere in which the life of the churches is lived. The life can exist, may even flourish, in another atmosphere, though it cannot flourish so greatly. But the atmosphere without the life lived in it is purposeless and useless. It exists not for its own sake but to support and keep healthy that life which is the all-important thing. Freedom of thought exists to preserve the health of belief; it exists—so far as religion is concerned—solely for the sake of that theological belief which is the expression of a man's religion; and a man's religion is the most important thing about him. No church can exist only or chiefly on truth-seeking, no church can exist only or chiefly for liberty to seek the truth. An undenominational church is as impossible as undenominational religious education. No amount of proclaiming that a church is undenominational can make it undenominational. A church may be more or less rigidly, more or less narrowly denominational. But it is not a question of the presence or absence of denominationalism; it is a question of kind of denominationalism. What is held to be undenominational by some because certain doctrines are not taught, is by others held to be denominational precisely because of the omission of those doctrines. A secondary matter in one man's religion is the very centre and heart of another's. And while it is generally the narrowness of denominationalism that is to be deplored, there is also an opposite extreme which leads to vague and loose thinking dangerous to the religious life, especially of the young, and enervating to the life of the congregation as a whole. This extreme is to be equally deplored. Every church is necessarily denominational, necessarily sectarian, necessarily has a creed. But there are creeds and creeds. There are the creeds of the churches which say, "This you must believe, if you are to be (what is called) saved. All who do not believe what we believe are necessarily lost."

And there are creeds (for every church must have a religious belief, though it do not make acceptance of such belief the condition of membership)—there are creeds which say: "This is what we believe to be the truth; this is our bread of life and our message to the world; this is the revelation of God we have received. But the revelation of God is not closed, it is unending; and as new truth is found we accept it also, setting aside such of the old as is incompatible with the new; as new light from heaven shines upon our souls we will walk by it, and, as we are able, spread it in the world." And as there are creeds and creeds, so there are sects and sects. And there must always be; for men must always have different, and very widely different, opinions on matters of religion—that is, very different theological beliefs. There must always be classes of religious thought, divisions among religious thinkers—sects. But there need not be and should not be ill-feeling between sects. Sectarianism must always be; it cannot be done away with, and it would not be good if it could. It is not sectarianism in itself that needs changing, but sectarianism as it is sometimes found. What need changing especially are the opinions many men hold about sectarianism in itself. There is good sectarianism, and there is bad sectarianism: let ours be the good.

Urgency of the Unitarian Message.

The freedom to seek, to think and to speak what we individually or congregationally believe to be the truth has, I say, been given an exaggerated predominance in our churches. Bring the idea to the front, raise it aloft, high, that all men may know; set forth the principle as of such grandeur, preciousness, beauty, power and sacredness that it shall appeal irresistibly to men's minds, win their love and inspire their lives. But there is that which has been too much neglected. There is that which we must set forth before men with equal persistence and power, bring to the front side by side with this great principle, and raise to no lower place, that all men may know it too; that it may win the allegiance of men's minds and the devotion of their hearts; that it may inspire and control their lives. It is the truth already found, the Unitarian message. Neither an individual nor a church has any religion as truth-seeking only. If there is any religion, truth (that which is believed to be true) has been found. As individuals we are all truth-seekers; but freedom to seek the truth does not nourish the religious life. It is the result of the search that supports the life, not the search. It is the truth which has been found by the individual, or agreed upon by the congregation, which is the life of the man or the church. It is the truth found, that which is believed, that shapes and rules the life of a man or a church. Important as freedom to seek more truth is, this is at least equally important.

In any of our churches why does one born and bred a member of the congregation remain? Domestic and social considerations among us, as among all, will have influence no doubt; but apart from that, does he remain because he enjoys liberty to seek the truth? He remains because he agrees with the theological principles taught, he is in sympathy with the form of expression of religion the church stands for. And the many who come to us from the other churches or none—do they join our congregations because there is liberty of thought? Perhaps one in a hundred. Practically all, because they agree with the theological opinions there declared, with the form of religion the church stands for; because they find rest after bewilderment, clear light after perplexing mysteries, power to reason freely about the most sacred things without suspicion of irreverence; because they find that the deepest spiritual truths can be expressed in terms of simple common-sense to be understood by all; because often they find emancipation from gloomy fears of destiny or from thraldom to despotic power, ecclesiastical or biblical, to which they have felt bound but unable to offer an unquestioning obedience; and this peace of heart, this light to guide, this wonderful emancipation they have longed to make known to their fellows, that they may share their joy. It is the converts who have zeal for propaganda; who least understand the content of so many Unitarians to be, but not to do, in the religious world, however nobly beneficent their doing in the world at large. We, probably alone among religious communities, welcome converts, and forthwith proceed to remove their hearts.

Our churches stand, then, for certain theological doctrines which express a certain form of religious faith, which means a certain spirit of life. And it is a trust laid upon the churches not only to go their way with content in the light, but to spread the light that others too may see. The churches stand for Unitarianism.

SCOTTISH UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

ANNUAL MEETINGS.

ON Sunday, Nov. 16, the sermons in connection with the annual meeting of the Scottish Unitarian Association were preached in St. Vincent-street Church, Glasgow, by the Rev. James Forrest, M.A. At the morning service Mr. Forrest spoke of the affirmative faith of Unitarianism, under the title of "A Unitarian Manifesto," and in the evening his subject was "Dr. James Martineau, Unitarianism, and Religious Progress." The congregations were large, and the collections for the funds of the Association very liberal.

On Monday afternoon the ministers and delegates, the members of the committee of the Association, and others were entertained to luncheon by the President (Dr. BARLOW) and his wife at their residence, 4, Somerset-place. This "innovation" was felt to be a most agreeable introduction to the other meetings of the day, and Dr. and Mrs. Barlow's kindly hospitality was much appreciated and heartily enjoyed.

The business meeting was held in St. Vincent-street Church at five o'clock, Dr. BARLOW presiding. In moving the adoption of the report the Chairman referred to the gratifying fact that all the Scottish churches were now under ministerial charge, and that all were showing signs of continued or increasing life and progress. An amendment in the paragraph dealing with the Education Question, proposed by Mr. Webster, was agreed to, and thereafter the report was unanimously adopted. The officers of the Association were all re-elected—Dr. Barlow as president, Mr. T. M. Semple as secretary, and Mr. M. Gemmell as treasurer. The Rev. J. Forrest was requested to allow his evening discourse to be printed by the Association and issued with the report; and, on his compliance, the proposal was cordially agreed to by the meeting. After the formal business of the meeting was over, the chairman invited suggestions that might be helpful in carrying on the work in Scotland, and an interesting conference ensued. It was strongly urged that if Scottish Unitarianism was to be advanced, and the churches made living centres of more effective work, there must be more united action, and the Scottish Association must be strengthened. All appeals for help of any kind should be made through its committee as the central organisation, and in all proposals of special effort in the interests of any individual church, or of Unitarianism generally, the Association should be directly recognised. This implied, of course, a larger measure of material as well as moral support than it had lately received, but this could readily be forthcoming if the churches were prepared, not merely to receive but to give, even if it involved some measure of sacrifice. This quite clearly was the feeling of the meeting, and the hearty endorsement of the expression given to it was a gratifying indication of a deeper interest in the work of the Association than has been shown for years.

The usual votes of thanks to officers and committee closed the meeting, which was well attended, and had been throughout heartily unanimous.

PUBLIC MEETING.

After tea, provided by Mrs. Barlow, and served in the Church Library, a public meeting was held in the church. The attendance was much larger than usual, and a spirit of unwonted enthusiasm quite evidently prevailed.

Dr. BARLOW presided, and was accompanied to the platform by the Revs. R. B. Drummond, James Forrest, A. Irvine Innes, and G. A. Ferguson. There were also present the Revs. A. Webster and E. T. Russell, and representatives from almost all the Scottish churches.

The CHAIRMAN, in the course of an interesting and helpful address, referred to the advantages of meeting together to report upon and consult regarding the progress of their common faith. He reviewed the Liberal Religious movement during the year, noting specially the decision in the case of Professor George Adam Smith, the sentence passed being the now familiar one of "not guilty, but don't do it again." Adverting to the education struggle in England, he said he saw no way out of the religious difficulty except that of the old Birmingham pronouncement in favour of "compulsory free and secular education." As to their own prospects as Scottish Unitarians he indicated that the success of their work largely depended on the support they gave to their own Association. More members were needed, increased interest, and a readiness for sacrifice on the part of the churches. He then heartily welcomed the ministers and delegates, and said they were specially pleased to have with them Mr. Innes, who was doing such good work at Kilmarnock, and Mr. Ferguson, the new minister at Kirkcaldy.

The Rev. R. B. DRUMMOND gave an interesting address on the progress and present position of Biblical criticism, particularly referring to several of the remarkable articles in the "Encyclopædia Biblica."

The Rev. A. I. INNES dealt, in a fervent and eloquent speech, with the Education Question. Referring to the suggestion that a Bill for Scotland was in contemplation, on the same lines as the present English Bill, he said that any such proposal must be strenuously resisted on both political and educational grounds.

The Rev. G. A. FERGUSON, in a few appropriate words, thanked the President and the members of the Association for the hearty welcome they had given him, and felt sure that he would find in a Scottish Unitarian Church a congenial sphere of work.

Mr. ROBERT STEWART proposed that the thanks of the meeting and the Association be given to Mr. Forrest for the excellent sermons to which they had listened the previous day. They all knew Mr. Forrest's eloquence and intellectual force as a preacher and lecturer, but on that occasion he had surpassed himself.

In reply, Mr. FORREST said that he was glad to know that the occasion and the cause had not suffered through the selection of a local minister as preacher of their annual sermons. The purpose he sought steadily to pursue and achieve was the advancement of Unitarianism as the spiritual faith which was the greatest need of the times. That purpose, he thought, the Scottish Association might greatly assist if it gave attention to the more efficient organisation of the forces at their disposal. There were many ways in which mutual helpfulness was possible. But perhaps more important than any was that of increased interest in their young people. In co-operation with the Scottish Unitarian Sunday School Union they might well enter upon a work which would be felt, not only in the renewal of their own Church life and activity, but in the entire Liberal Religious movement throughout the country, which would undoubtedly thus receive an incalculable progressive impulse.

A short programme of vocal and instrumental music was given by members of St. Vincent-street Church Choir, Mr. E. C. Pryor acting as accompanist. Votes of thanks to all who had contributed to the success of the meetings were heartily accorded, and the proceedings closed with a benediction.

EASTERN UNION OF UNITARIAN AND OTHER FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCHES.

THE annual meetings were held at Norwich on Wednesday, Nov. 19, when, after lunch for the ministers and delegates of the Union, the Executive met, and an hour later the business meeting was held in the Octagon Chapel. The President, Mr. F. ROBINSON, of Ipswich, was in the chair, and, in opening the proceedings, made a hopeful speech, dwelling upon the progress of Unitarian thought.

Miss DOWSON presented the report of the Postal Mission, showing that a large amount of correspondence had been carried on, and a vote of thanks was passed to her, on the motion of the Rev. J. POLLARD, seconded by the Rev. A. HALL.

The Rev. JAMES HARWOOD, who was present as representative of the B. and F.U.A., reported on his visits to churches in the Union, and on the motion of the Rev. L. Tavener, seconded by Mr. T. H. SMITH, hearty thanks were accorded to the Association.

Mr. HARWOOD, in his reply, said that even in more thickly populated parts Unitarians were only a small handful of people. That was a reason not for standing apart from each other, but for drawing near to each other; and, even as the countenance of man cheered his brethren, so those who were bound together in religious sympathy should try and help each other by meeting from time to time and taking counsel together. It was his duty to convey to them from the British and Foreign Association a message of earnest and sincere sympathy in their work. In London they knew something of the difficulties under which that work was conducted. He then proceeded to speak of some of the ways in which the Association sought to help the churches, and urged congregations especially to be careful in the selection of ministers, and always to seek advice and full information before receiving an unknown man. He spoke with pleasure of the unparalleled success of the new Hibbert Review as a good omen for the future, and of the great value of Postal Mission work.

The Rev. A. HALL then read the report of the Executive. It stated, inter alia, that in some cases very successful work had been done, but it would also be noticed that some of the churches had been weakened and discouraged. Owing to the severe losses sustained by the death of some of their most influential and active members the report must be of a somewhat sad nature. Moreover, some of the old difficulties with which the members of the committee had been contending for several months past still remained unsolved. In the month of December they lost their respected treasurer, Mr. H. E. Blazeby. For several years he had been the life of the Union, and the loss occasioned by his death was irreparable. He had been treasurer since 1886. He was possessed of a quaint and pleasing humour, under which was hidden an inner earnestness the intensity of which those who knew him best were most conscious of. His genial disposition made him welcome everywhere, and his generosity called forth the love and gratitude of many of the poor. At the beginning of the year two other of their friends passed away, Mr. J. Leach, of Yarmouth, and Mr. James Youngman, of Wickham Market. Mr. Leach was the mainstay of the cause at Yarmouth, and Mr. Youngman was the first layman to fill the office of president of that Association. Though not falling within the year, they had to record the death of Mr. I. M. Wade, a man whose name was known in every Unitarian church, and the extent of whose influence it was impossible to estimate. For years he was secretary to the Unitarian Sunday School Association, and he had done more for the Sunday-schools of the Association than any other man. Into every part of the country he travelled, urging the young people to devote their efforts to the training of children to the service of God, and the furtherance of the faith. There was no stauncher Unitarian than he, and they were proud that so strong and enthusiastic a man came from their district, and was so devoted to its interests.

On the motion of Mr. JAMES MOTTRAM, seconded by Mr. R. W. LADELL, the report was adopted, and the officers were then elected, with Mr. W. J. Scopes, of Ipswich, as president, and Rev. A. Hall as secretary.

A welcome was accorded to the Rev. J. Pollard, settled at Lynn, and a farewell to the Rev. A. Amey, about to remove to Colyton.

In the evening an inspiring sermon was preached by the Rev. J. Harwood, from the text "Launch out into the deep."

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

CHRISTMAS APPEAL.

London: Mansford-street Church and Mission.—The Rev. John Ellis writes:—The Poor's Purse, which was handed on to me by my predecessor, is now exhausted. I understand that an appeal through your columns about this time generally elicited a response from the generous-hearted in donations sufficient to meet requirements during the year. The need is great. Bad trade and consequent diminished earnings seriously affect many in this district who have, in good times, a hard struggle "to make ends meet." I therefore renew the appeal. It will be my endeavour to distribute such sums as are sent me with the greatest care. In the faith that the usual subscriptions and donations will also be sent to provide Christmas gifts to more than 300 Sunday-school scholars, and Christmas cheer at the various parties, arrangements have been made as in former years. My short experience of life in East London convinces me that such benefactions as come out of this season of good-will go a great way towards mitigating the hardships of the suffering poor. Clothing, both new and old, is greatly needed, especially for men and women. Parcels may be addressed to Mrs. Ellis, Donations should be sent to the Rev. John Ellis, The Parsonage, Mansford-street, Bethnal Green, E.

Ashton-under-Lyne. — Choir sermons were preached last Sunday by the Rev. J. Mason Bass, M.A., of Chesham, Bury. A special musical service was held in the afternoon.

Bedfield and Framlingham (Resignation).—The Rev. Alfred Amey, after a ministry of more than ten years, has resigned his position in Suffolk, and is taking a pulpit in the West of England. All who know Mr. Amey's good and strenuous work at Bedfield will wish him well in his new sphere of labour.

Boston.—The congregation of Spain-lane Chapel has sustained a heavy loss in the death, last Saturday, of Miss Rooke, in her eightieth year. During all her life she has been a constant worshipper at the old chapel, and, as far as her means would allow, contributed most liberally to the support of the services and ministry. While others fell away, she remained faithful. To the last she was most regular in her attendance—fine weather or foul. Lying on what proved to be her deathbed, she was greatly delighted to hear of the large and distinguished gathering at the chapel on Mayor's Sunday, which seemed to predict a revival of the old times when the church was a centre of light and leading in the town.

Bradford.—A three days' bazaar, having for its object the raising of at least £200 for the extinction of a debt incurred by the renovation of the Chapel-lane Chapel, and for other purposes, was opened in the Channing Hall on Nov. 20. The bazaar was opened by Mrs. Crompton, of Rivington Hall, the chair being taken by the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, who said that during the last four years there had been three bazaars in that room, but if four years ago anybody had predicted such a thing he believed they would scarcely have smiled again. Yet he observed that they all looked happy. The need for the present bazaar was occasioned by something which, at the time, they considered a calamity. Just as they had finished paying for the Channing Hall it was found that the arches over the aisles of the church were giving way, and they had to be replaced to save the beautiful building. Another object of the bazaar was to provide new hymn and service books for the church. Mr. Jones extended a cordial welcome to Mrs. Crompton, and remarked that her family had been associated with the Free Churches from the old Puritan times. It might be of interest to them to know that one of the founders of the Rivington Hall family, some two and a-half centuries ago, was a friend of Oliver Heywood, who took a very important part in the founding of that church. Mrs. Crompton, in declaring the bazaar open, delivered a thoughtful address on the high ideals of the Unitarian Free Churches. On the proposition of Miss Hudson, seconded by Mr. L. Badland, and supported by the Rev. W. Harvey-Cook, the hearty thanks of the meeting were accorded to Mrs. Crompton for her services. On the following day the opening ceremony was performed by the Mayor of Bradford (Alderman D. Wade, J.P.), who paid a high tribute to the congregation for the steadfast manner in which it had promoted the cause of civil and religious liberty, and for the part it had taken in promoting the welfare of the community during its long history. The chair was occupied by Mr. Byron Boothroyd. On the motion of Mr. F. R. Pesel, J.P., seconded by Mr. John Ellis, the Mayor was cordially thanked for his services. At the reopening on Saturday, the 22nd, Mr. Ferdinand Heilborn presided over a large assembly, the opener being Mr. Grosvenor Talbot, J.P., President of the Yorkshire Unitarian Union. Mr. Talbot, in the course of his opening speech, said there had been a great deal of progress made in the line of religious thought during the last fifty years, and it was a well-known fact that members of all religious denominations were treading on the heels of Unitarianism of a half-century since. The sale was continued on Monday, the 24th, and at the close of the day it was found that the proceeds, including subscriptions, amounted to £302, being £102 more than the promoters had originally aimed at, but not more than will meet present requirements. It is a great satisfaction to the minister and congregation to feel that their beautiful premises in Town Hall-square are now quite free from debt.

Clifton.—Oakfield-road Church was filled by an audience of nearly four hundred men last Sunday afternoon, when his Honour Judge Austin addressed the M.O.M. on "The Present Position of Trade Unions." England, Judge Austin said, was not a great producing country, with correspondingly great powers of recuperation, like France, but a workshop, depending upon her trade, and would be paralysed by any serious blow struck at her commerce. He proceeded to speak of the benefits which had been derived from Trade Unions and their weaknesses, and in conclusion said that the happiest fact in the relations between employers and employed was the much greater willingness exhibited by both to come to arbitration. When himself called upon to arbitrate, he had been much impressed by the leaders' clear-headedness, good sense, and good temper. He concluded by saying that the remedy for industrial ills was of a twofold character. It consisted on the one hand in education in the truest sense—not merely technical education, but such as should broaden the minds of the men; and on the other hand, in the recognition of the teaching of Jesus Christ, which had been almost buried under layers of dogmatic theology—the teaching that God was our Father, and that all men were brothers. The true way to live was to have affection for God and respect for one's neighbour. An animated and friendly discussion followed. These Men's Open Meetings have been well attended from the first, and are establishing themselves as a useful and much-appreciated feature of the life and work of Oakfield-road Church.

Croydon (Resignation).—At a special meeting of members of the Free Christian Church held on Sunday, Nov. 23, the following letter from the minister was read:—"Dear Friends,—Fifty years ago I preached my first sermon as a student for the ministry, and, almost without a break, except for very occasional illness or for a brief holiday, I have kept the field; and now, as Emerson said:—

'It is time to be old,
To take in sail.'

And yet, though I think it is time to 'take in sail,' I am very far from feeling that it is time to end the voyage. All I propose to do is to cease from the charge of a church, and to give myself to the work of what has been called 'the ministry at large' at a moderate pace. So next March I must cease to be your minister, though I hope to be often allowed to come to you as visitor. With all my heart I wish you success and joy under some better leader than I could ever be.—Ever yours, J. PAGE HOPPS." Although not altogether unlooked for, the serious tone of the meeting evidenced that this was felt as a severe blow; but ultimately the following resolution was passed by all rising in their places as a mark of sincere respect for their minister for more than ten years past:—"That the members of the Free Christian Church, Croydon, assembled at this special meeting, having heard the letter read which has been addressed to them by their appointed minister, the Rev. J. Page Hopps, feel that there is no course open to them but to accept his resignation. This they reluctantly do, with sincerest regret, heartily reciprocating the kindly and hopeful feelings with which it has been tendered, and wishing Mr. Hopps Godspeed in his future career."

Gateshead (Presentation).—On Thursday, Nov. 20, the members and friends assembled to show their appreciation of the services of their minister, the Rev. Arthur Harvie, and of Mrs. Harvie. An excellent musical programme was rendered, and during an interval the secretary, Mr. S. Hulse, took the chair, and having read several letters of apology for absence, called upon Alderman J. Baxter Ellis, President of the N. and D.U.C. Association, to present to Mr. Harvie an enlarged carbon portrait, framed in oak, of himself, bearing the following inscription:—"Presented to the Rev. Arthur Harvie, founder and first minister of Unity Church, Gateshead, by members and friends, as a token of their esteem and gratitude for faithful services rendered. And by him presented to the church, November, 1902." Alderman Ellis spoke of the good work Mr. Harvie had done in the district, and said the choice made by the Association, when Mr. Harvie was appointed, had been a fortunate one. All their expectations had been realised in the good work in which they were engaged. He had the greatest possible pleasure in making that presentation. Mrs. S. Hulse, the oldest lady member of the church, then asked Mrs. Harvie to accept an easy chair and a silver clasp from her numerous friends, together with a warmly-appreciative address, acknowledging her services to the church and school. Mr. and Mrs. Harvie both made fitting response, the former concluding by presenting his portrait to the trustees of the church. The evening, which was greatly enjoyed, was concluded with the singing of the hymn, "Our Fathers' Faith."

Glossop.—On Sunday morning, Nov. 16, the new Mayor of Glossop (Captain Edward Partington, J.P.) attended service at the Unitarian Church. In the procession from the Town Hall, the Mayor, attended by the Deputy-Mayor and Town Clerk, was accompanied by the borough police and local Volunteers, members of the Council, county and borough magistrates, guardians, officials of the Corporation, and a large number of burgesses. The church was wholly inadequate to accommodate all who intended to be present at the service, very many having to be refused admittance. The Rev. A. Cunliffe Fox, B.A., conducted the service, and preached to a congregation of nearly 400, consisting almost entirely of men, on "The Old and the New Jerusalem." The event is unique in the annals of the borough. Not only is Captain Partington its first Unitarian Mayor, but he is also the first Mayor who has attended, in his official capacity, a Nonconformist place of worship since the incorporation of the town in 1866. The new Mayor has been a generous supporter of the Unitarian movement in Glossop for upwards of twenty-five years, and it was largely owing to his great munificence that the congregation was enabled to erect its present handsome edifice. The collection, £15 5s., has been handed over to the local hospital.

Huddersfield.—On Wednesday, Nov. 19, a successful Sale of Work was held in the Fitzwilliam-street School, in aid of church expenses. The Rev. W. Mellor presided, and the sale was opened by the Deputy Mayor (Alderman Woodhead). The sale was continued on the following day, and the total receipts were £60 13s. 9d.

Kilmarnock.—A conference of the Scottish Unitarian Sunday School Union was held in the Clerks-lane Church, on Saturday, Nov. 15, Mr. H. B. Melville, of Kirkcaldy, president, in the chair. There was a large attendance of members, all schools from the various Scottish centres of Unitarianism being represented. The Rev. H. Williamson read a paper on "A Plea for Guilds in Scotland." A paper on "Bible Teaching" was also read by the Rev. A. Irvine Innes, and both papers were followed by discussion. The Union resolved to affiliate with the London Sunday School Association.

London : Hampstead.—A soirée was held in the Rosslyn-hill schoolroom on Wednesday evening in order to afford the members of the congregation an opportunity of meeting and welcoming the Rev. Henry Gow, their new minister, and his wife. The event, by a happy chance, coincided with the first occasion on which the reorganised Congregational Society threw open its doors to all who attend the chapel, and the result was a room filled even beyond its seating capacity. After the general welcome on behalf of the congregation had been given in cordial terms by the chairman, Mr. Walter Baily, and seconded by Mr. Adams, who delicately indicated a Newcastle programme of works it was thought that the minister might with advantage undertake, the Rev. J. E. Stronge, as minister of the neighbouring chapel at Kilburn, rose in support, and, in a speech of fine feeling, recalled the high traditions of the chapel on the ministry of which Mr. Gow was entering. Dr. Blake Odgers followed with stirring words as to the work which lay to be done not merely in developing the life of the congregation itself, but outside it in the various centres of activity throughout London. Mr. Gow, in acknowledging the welcome, dwelt on the responsibility which he could not but feel in following such ministers as had occupied the pulpit before him, and called to mind the saintly presence of Dr. Sadler, the cheery faith and commonsense of Dr. Brooke Herford, and those high qualities in Mr. Daplyn's ministry which he knew to have been of such deep help to many. While disclaiming all idea of formulating at so early a date any definite scheme of future work, Mr. Gow briefly indicated certain broad lines on which he hoped the internal life of the congregation might be developed, laying stress on the value of the intellectual aspect of such societies as the conference instituted by his predecessor. He closed with a reciprocation of the hope which had been expressed for cordial co-operation in all matters affecting the welfare of the congregation. General conversation, varied with music kindly contributed by Miss Wylie and Mr. Arnold Jones, brought the evening to a close.

London Sunday School Society.—A social meeting of the teachers and senior scholars of the London schools affiliated to the Society was held on Saturday last at Essex Hall. Representatives from nearly all the schools were there, and any visitor entering the crowded hall during the tea hour which preceded the entertainment must have been struck by the animated picture presented by the many little groups of young people seated in circles enjoying their chat and feeling evidently quite at home. The main attraction on the programme was a lecture on "The Gems from our Galleries," by the Rev. W. C. Pope, President of the Society. At the stated time the audience took their seats, the lights were put out, and the opening hymn, "Lend a Hand," shown on the screen, was heartily sung. The President prefaced his short address by mentioning that the hymn just sung, and the tune also, had been composed by members of the Society. He said that during his early life, passed in far-away British Columbia, he came to know something of the Unitarian leaders and workers from reading about them in the papers, but it was not until he came to London and to Essex Hall that he made their personal acquaintance. Possibly many of the young people before him shared in the same experience. They had heard of the Society and of the active members to whom its existence and success were due; but it was not until they came to Essex Hall that the personal acquaintances were made. The lantern lecture now commenced, reproductions of famous pictures of old and new masters being shown, one after the other, on the screen, accompanied by a few words of description; and here acknowledgment should be made to Mr. F. E. Allen and his assistants for the efficiency of the display. The pictures were excellently shown; indeed, one member of the meeting expressed the opinion that to his mind the picture on the screen was preferable to the picture in the gallery. Interspersed during the evening, and as a pleasant change, songs were given by members and friends of the Society.

Northampton.—The morning preacher at Kettering-road Church last Sunday, when collections were taken for the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, was Mr. W. H. Shrubsole, F.G.S., and in the evening an address on "The Religious Life of Hungary" was given by Miss Györy, of Buda-Pesth, who has already spoken in more than one of our churches. On Monday evening a successful congregational At Home was held, when Miss Györy gave a further address, which was warmly appreciated.

Norwich.—The announcement of the death of Mrs. Cunningham, the younger daughter of Mr. J. D. Wright, on Friday, Nov. 21, after a short illness, from erysipelas, has cast a gloom over the Octagon congregation. The deceased was only twenty-six years old, but for some years had been Superintendent of the Octagon Infants' Sunday-school, which she had increased to an unprecedented number. She revealed great ability in instructing the young in the elements of religion, and took a deep interest in their personal welfare, while her bright and genial manner made her beloved and respected by both old and young. She leaves a husband and a child, a few months old, to mourn her loss. The funeral, which took place on Tuesday, was conducted by the Revs. John Lewis and Alfred Hall, who only eighteen months ago officiated at her marriage.—The Rev. Alfred Hall, M.A., was on Tuesday returned unopposed as a member of the Norwich School Board, with the other members of the last Board.

Rotherham.—A sermon on the Dean of Ripon's address on "Natural Christianity" was preached by the Rev. W. Stephens, in the Church of Our Father, on Sunday, Nov. 16, and is printed in full in last Saturday's Rotherham Advertiser. Having given an account of the Dean's address, Mr. Stephens referred to the outcry it had caused in orthodox circles, and on this made the following remarks:—"For my own part I do not see how the Sacerdotalists or the Rationalists can consistently minister in the Anglican Church as it is now constituted. They seem to me to both violate their ordination vows and go beyond the Book they are supposed to follow. But how absurd it is for the Romanists in a Protestant Church to complain of the Rationalists within the same enclosure! Why should one section have freedom and the other be denied freedom? It would be just as reasonable to expel the Rationalist as it would the Ritualist. It is much better to make the Church comprehensive enough to include all than to squeeze out all but one particular type. If you are going to pursue a policy of excommunication, where will you begin and where will you end? Will you expel the Evangelicals, the Ritualists, or the Rationalists? Better let them all have liberty than to allow it to some and to refuse it to others. The law cannot condemn the Ritualist and justify the Rationalist, neither can it penalise the Rationalist and let the Ritualist do as he likes. The law must be equal for all."

South Cheshire and District Association.—On Saturday, Nov. 8, the autumnal meeting was held at Newcastle-under-Lyne. In the afternoon, after a short business meeting, a religious service was conducted in the Old Chapel by the Rev. George A. Payne, of Knutsford, whose able and interesting discourse was much appreciated. After tea a conference was held, presided over by the Rev. J. C. Street, when Mr. Boot read an interesting paper on the subject, "How the Association can best help the Congregations at Newcastle and Longton." In the discussion that followed, Mr. H. G. Wilson, Miss Montgomery, Mr. F. Cooper, the Rev. G. H. Smith, and the Rev. W. Birks took part. It should be mentioned that a letter of greeting and good wishes was read from Miss Emily Sharpe, who for so long has taken such a deep interest in the Unitarian cause in North Staffordshire.

South Shields.—The Sunday-school anniversary was celebrated in Unity Church last Sunday, when two eloquent sermons were preached by Miss Lucas, of Darlington. A very good congregation assembled in the evening. Special hymns were sung by the children and much appreciated. In the afternoon a children's service was held, when an address was given by the superintendent, the attendance being a record one for our Sunday-school. A Boys' Brigade and Band of Hope, recently started, show excellent results.

Wolverhampton.—On Tuesday evening last, after a tea partaken of by a number of members and friends in the schoolroom of All Souls' Church (Unitarian), an interesting lecture was delivered by Mr. Enoch Evans, of Small Heath, Birmingham, entitled "The Conservation of Energy in Modern Times." The lecturer pointed out how, by the application of modern methods and machinery to the various problems of science and manufacture, vastly greater results can be obtained nowadays with the same expenditure of energy than was formerly the case.

"Flower-o'-the-Corn is Mr. Crockett's Apotheosis," say some of the Reviewers;

"Flower-o'-the-Corn must be placed high among Mr. Crockett's Second Best," say Others.

The consensus of opinion of the critics may be summed up in the closing words of the able reviews in The Glasgow Herald and Lloyd's Weekly Newspaper:—

"Mr. Crockett has never introduced his readers to anything so impressive and effective as the Camisard insurrection, the wild heights of the Cevennes, and the rugged virtues of the psalm-singers of the South. . . . Wellwood and Raith are both finely-drawn figures, and Flower-o-the-Corn and Yvette, the Eve and Lilith of the tale, are as striking portraits of womanhood as may be found in fiction."—GLASGOW HERALD.

"We have had many good books from Mr. Crockett's pen, but certainly none better than the present one. There is much intrigue, plot, and counter-plot before the gallant captain and 'Flower o'-the-Corn' find peace and happiness together. It is a fine story, and one that will enhance Mr. Crockett's reputation."—LLOYD'S.

A BOOK TO BE BOUGHT.

THE LIFE AND LETTERS OF JAMES MARTINEAU.

By the Rev. JAMES DRUMMOND, Principal of Manchester College, Oxford, and the Rev. C. B. UPTON.

In Two Large Volumes (with several Portraits and Illustrations), Demy 8vo, 30s. net.

PRESS OPINIONS.

"The two volumes of 'The Life and Letters of Dr. Martineau,' which we owe to his friends Principal Drummond and Professor Upton, will be prized by all who knew or admired one of the great ethical teachers and one of the purest and noblest figures of our time."—TIMES.

"These volumes intensify, if possible, our admiration for Dr. Martineau's great intellectual powers, his rare skill as a dialectician, his splendid faculty for exposition; but, above all, for a rare sweetness and graciousness of spirit and for a profound insight into the things that matter—those things that transcend time and space, and alone give to human life stability and sanctity."—WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

"A worthy representation of one of the most impressive and gracious figures of the century just closed."—SCOTSMAN.

"The book is one of the most remarkable contributions to biographical literature published within recent years."—DUNDEE COURIER.

"We rejoice to think that it had fallen into such good hands to satisfy the need, and that their mission here has been so fully and so satisfyingly accomplished."—CHRISTIAN WORLD.

"We receive these volumes as a very precious gift. No other book published in our time can affect us quite as this does."—THE INQUIRER.

SELECTIONS FROM

THE OCCASIONAL SERMONS AND ADDRESSES OF

JOHN HAMILTON THOM.

EDITED WITH A MEMOIR BY

V. D. DAVIS, B.A.

Crown 8vo, 224 pp. A Companion Volume to "Christ the Revealer."

"A brief and well-written biography is followed by extracts from sermons and addresses, three complete discourses, and an address to students. The book appeals naturally, in the first place, to those who share Mr. Thom's conceptions of a liberal, undogmatic Christianity, but there is much to interest any serious thinker."—MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.

"Selections, pertinent and illuminating, from the sermons and addresses of Mr. Thom, the broad-minded Unitarian minister, and friend of Dr. Martineau. Mr. Davis's memoir is a good example of description and selection in a small space."—BOOKMAN.

"The book will be made most welcome by those who know the two volumes of 'Laws of Life after the Mind of Christ,' and it may do more than even those volumes to keep this good man's influence alive."—EXPOSITORY TIMES.

"There is much helpful thought in these selections, presented with clearness and force, and calculated to be of value to earnest minds and of especial use to those who are engaged in public ministry. There is a directness in J. H. Thom's treatment of his subjects, both as regards the duties of the ministry and the congregation, which is at once suggestive and inspiring, and which must appeal to men of sincere purpose, whether their views be considered orthodox or heterodox."—BRITISH FRIEND.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE course of lectures on "The Bible in the Nineteenth Century," which the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter has been delivering at Bristol, Swansea, Manchester and Leicester is concluded this week, and has again more than justified the hopes both of the local churches and the B. and F.U.A., who were jointly responsible for the scheme. Large attendances have been maintained to the end, and the most earnest attention was given to the lecturer. At Swansea, especially, a very widespread interest was excited, and the audience numbered over 400, while at Bristol the attendance at the last lecture was the largest of the whole course. Much gratitude has been expressed to Mr. Carpenter for these lectures, which, undoubtedly, have rendered great service to the cause of liberal religious thought. The book which will shortly embody the substance of these lectures we hope to receive early in the New Year.

MR. GOTTFRIED SCHWARZ, of whose accusation we gave some particulars last week, has found at least one defender of his cause in the German Press. In an article on the case Professor Böhtlingk, of Karlsruhe, describes Schwarz's treatise on "The Fetish-Worship of the Church" as manifesting "a thoughtful and sacred seriousness, clear in conception and pure in expression," as a "clean-cut, plain-spoken piece of inexorable scientific criticism." If the pamphlet on "Leo XIII. before the Judgment Seat of Christ" is less objective this springs from the nature of the subject. If, however, it were really injurious to the State it would not have been allowed to reach a second edition. He asks if things have reached such a pass that in a University city such as Heidelberg an Evangelical theologian is not to be permitted to publish a scientifically constructed statement of his religious convictions, and says that the Curia would not have dared to proceed against Schwarz were it not that he is a solitary, outside either the Catholic or the Protestants State-protected Churches. The article concludes by declaring that "with Gottfried Schwarz stands or falls the cause of freedom of conscience and religion in Baden."

So far as our information at present goes, Mr. Schwarz has undoubtedly brought himself within reach of the penalties of the law. In his pamphlets he is led by inexorable logic in all sincerity to make statements as to the Pope and Roman Catholic usages which can only appear to them as gross insult, and this is forbidden by law. He will be tried in January by the "Schwurgericht," so that a jury of twelve will decide by a two-thirds majority whether he is guilty or not guilty, and the three judges will then determine the measure of his punishment according to their view of the gravity of the offence. Three years' imprisonment is the maximum penalty allowed. The sentence may be for months, or only a day. It is, in any case, desirable, even while we regret what appear to us unfortunate expressions in his pamphlets, that Mr. Schwarz should be placed in a position to secure the best legal advice and an adequate defence at his trial.

ONE of the signs of the times in connection with the education struggle is the resignation of Sir Michael Foster in consequence of the policy adopted by the Government. In announcing his decision, Sir Michael explains that he wished to resign some months ago, when the Bill was presented. He felt that that measure contained provisions out of harmony with the spirit of the University of London, for which he has sat, and contrary to the views of a majority of his constituents. He was prevailed upon to retain his seat till the Commons had practically completed their consideration of the Bill, and now he claims release, with a mind ill at ease. How many other Unionist representatives sympathise with him in this matter we cannot guess, but it is very certain that in many cases the majority of their constituents would be against the Bill. It has now passed the third reading, and for good or ill it goes up to the Lords. Rumours have been afloat respecting amendments calculated to strengthen further the hold of the clergy on the schools. The Bishops, under the guidance of Archbishop Temple (who thinks the Bill is hard on the clergy) are evidently keenly interested; but it is doubtful whether Mr. Balfour's friends will accept any amendment which will explicitly secure the Episcopal interference which, as last week's debates show, he prefers to leave in a studied ambiguity of language.

THE School Board for London, whose good works have earned for it a fate similar to that proposed by Polyphemus for Odysseus—namely, that it should be swallowed up after all its companions in misfortune, seems at least to have escaped the worst calamity. We are told the Government will not chop its system into little bits, to be allotted respectively to the Metropolitan Borough Councils. Anyone who knows what the nature of its business is must marvel that such a course was ever contemplated. "That way madness lies." It is announced, apparently with authority, that the whole work of the Board will be handed over to the London County Council, a body which would be eminently fitted in many ways to do the work if only its hands were not already fairly full, and if it could be sure that the forthcoming Bill would not tie its hands by all sorts of limiting regulations. But it will be well to defer speculation till we see what proposals the Government really make.

WE recorded some little time ago, with great satisfaction, that the authorities of King's College, London, had decided to seek for powers to abolish religious tests as a qualification for membership of the College, or any appointment except that of professor or lecturer in theology. Since 1828 King's College, on behalf of the Church of England, has upheld the sectarian principle, as against the unsectarianism of University College, but now has recognised the injury to educational efficiency involved in such a course. The Manchester Guardian, in noting that the College is promoting a Bill in Parliament next session to abolish, with the one exception, its religious tests, adds the following remarks :—

The Church of England clergy and laymen who control King's College may be congratulated on their intention to abolish tests, as Oxford and Cambridge did a generation ago. But it is strange that the last relic of the old intolerance should thus disappear from our higher education at the instance of the very people who are seeking to maintain and strengthen religious tests in our elementary education. King's College is throwing open most of its professorships to men of all creeds because it finds that only by this means can it hope to attract the best teachers. But half the elementary schools in the country, though supported entirely out of taxes and rates, are to remain virtually closed to all but members of the Established Church, whether or no they are the best teachers who can be obtained. "Is there a single argument," asked Mr. Morley the other night, "against tests in higher education which does not apply with absolutely the same force, or even with greater force, against tests in elementary education?" The Anglican authorities of King's College would find it hard to answer that question.

CANON MALCOLM MACCOLL, of Ripon, has published a lengthy "letter" to Dr. Guinness Rogers, an old companion in political struggles, but one from whom he now feels bound to separate, chiefly on the Education question. The pamphlet, which is entitled "The Education Question and the Liberal Party," is well worth reading, especially by those of us who, from ignorance or for a better reason, have little sympathy with the "Church" case. That case is put with much vigour and argumentative skill by Dr. MacColl, and it ought to be very carefully weighed, not only that its cogency may be tested, but also that those who object to denominationalism may more adequately measure the strength of the sentiments and convictions which they seek to overcome. He maintains that "undenominational education" implies a negation of Christianity and even theism. Of course it does, if the idea be pushed to a logical extreme; but it was due to logical extremes that men burned one another at the stake, and we have learned to moderate much, and, in particular, to believe that while the attempt to get the "greatest common measure" of all religions is a philosophical nicety, in practice our people at large agree tolerably about what is to them essential, and are largely indifferent to non-essentials.

IN his efforts to minimise the sectarian importance of the Bill Dr. MacColl maintains (we think rightly, if the Kenyon-Slaney amendment stands) that it will diminish clerical power. On the other hand, it is singular, not to say funny, to hear so keen-witted and experienced a politician suggest that the popular minority of one-third on the managing boards will be so stimulated to personal zeal through the very consciousness of being a minority, that it will be really more effective than if it had been a majority! When we come to what Dr. MacColl regards as "the real issue" we are forced to recognise how radically some of us differ from the typical Churchman, even though he be a very liberal one. To the Canon's imagination the only thing that stands between "property" and sheer revolutionary confiscation, nay, between ordinary decency and the grossest depravity, is "dogmatic Christianity." He points to ancient Greece and Rome, and cites the well-worn frescoes of Pompeii in proof of the sad case of humanity without this sovereign remedy. That kind of appeal is hardly worthy of so enlightened a writer, and its appearance so prominently on his pages goes far to prejudice his previous trenchant arguments for the continuance of denominational schools.

THE Rev. W. B. Luke, writing in the Free Methodist, animadverts upon the conduct of the Devonshire clergyman who, advertising for a gardener, added, "no Bible Christian or incompetent person need apply." Says Mr. Luke: "In itself the incident is unworthy of serious notice, but taken in connection with the Education Bill it is highly significant. Here is a rector—the type of a large class which regards Dissent as a kind of moral disease. Suppose him to have a school of his own, and that the only one in the parish." In that case, it is pointed out, this gentleman will direct the religious teaching, and regulate the atmosphere (an atmosphere very uncongenial to Bible Christians and other Dissenters), while the school will be maintained by rates levied on the public at large.

IN the death of Dr. Parker Evangelical Nonconformity loses one of its most conspicuous leaders, and the Congregational pulpit one of its most magnetic personalities. The great secret of his hold on the public was his strong individuality. He was always himself. Whether in his virtues or his failings people had no difficulty in saying "That's just like Parker." He was no echo, no man's follower, no copyist, but in a certain way—many found it an unpleasant way—distinctly original. He was so characteristically unconventional in his ways and expressions that he often gave offence, the more so because a faint suspicion would now and then cross the mind that the unconventionality lacked the convincing note of spontaneity. But it is so perfectly refreshing to come across a man who refuses to be clipped and rounded to the accepted pattern, and will persist in growing according to his own nature and vitality, that even if the unconventionality is sometimes a little studied it may be forgiven. It is not easy under the constitution of modern society to develop that personal force which makes a man a veritable "I." Parker was essentially a primitive man, vivid, ebullient, passionate, resolved to go his own way, and at all costs to be Joseph Parker. No church committee could control him, no college committee ever tried. He was not easy to work with on committees at all, and preferred to do things off his own bat. With little faith in customs, in corporations, in institutions, in machinery, he had boundless faith in himself. Such a man is apt to be charged, perhaps not unjustly, with egotism, but he wins attention, commands a hearing, and is felt like one of the elemental forces of nature.

PARKER was one thing only—a preacher, but a preacher with a distinct touch of genius, rich in a diversity of gifts, intellectual, emotional, dramatic. Without contributing anything to the critical, reconstructive and theological light of the day, he had a wonderful power of presenting the old articles of Evangelical faith in a new light and of illuminating the well worn themes of the Evangelical pulpit. He was now and then capable of great oratory. He had bubbling springs of humour. He thought and spoke pictorially. If here and there his rhetoric seemed audacious or grotesque, so are the gargoyles and flying buttresses of York Minster. He had an infallible ear for the telling phrase, which he drove home with the power of a Boanerges. There were also wells of tenderness in him which in his best moments he drew upon and poured out upon his hearers like rain upon the mown grass. He knew how to be melodious, and he also knew how to break in upon the mere sweetness of music with clashing discords. It was a strange, picturesque, somewhat bizarre prophet that stood in the pulpit of the City Temple and attracted those enormous crowds of all sorts and conditions of men. Some went out of curiosity, some as to an entertainment, some to learn the preacher's art and get a hint for their own feeble efforts, some to see one of the lions of London, and many, we may well believe, to find light on their difficulties, encouragement under their burdens and inspiration for their daily lives. None came empty away. His sway over an audience was remarkable. As was said of an orator in another sphere, he played on the crowd like an old fiddle. Now they were in tears and now unable to suppress their laughter. Now they would be thrilled with the tones of a tragedian and now melted by a quiet bit of human sympathy. There was never anything quite like it. "Parkeresque" was all the comment that could be made.

OF course, he had his limitations. He knew it to be a man's wisdom to concentrate himself, and he said, "This one thing I do—preach the Gospel." He would not have his time frittered away on committees, nor in visitation. His work was in the study and the pulpit. A self-taught man, he laboured diligently to overcome the want of early training, and attained a certain distinction of literary style which the Times was glad to pay for. He built up no church, founded no institutions; his congregation was largely made up of strangers—was, in fact, a running stream, whose waters were never the same, into which he threw his seed to be carried he knew not whither. He was at his best when dealing directly with the great things of religion. When he branched off into sociology, or political economy, or the relation of science to theology, he showed himself to be strangely ignorant of the most elementary facts of the case. A well-known Socialist, once induced to go and hear the great man, advertised to preach on "Christian Socialism," remarked at the close, "Parker knows about as much of Socialism as did Goliath." His amazing fertility of phrase and illustration helped him over a good deal of thin ice, but those who loved him best were always glad when the side excursion was abandoned, and the prophet came back to his own domain. There many leaned on him, as upon another Great Heart, and his record will be found not in the books he wrote, but in the hearts' affections he quickened, in the brave, manly characters he helped to build up, in the life of faith and high endeavour he inspired many to attempt.

THE Daily News on the late Dr. Parker has been an astonishment, we should think, to a good many people. Exaggeration too easily overbalances into the ridiculous, and if the Daily News is now in thorough-going Nonconformist hands, we would plead for a better sense of proportion. The climax was reached on Thursday, when the back page of our contemporary presented a big picture of the "Lying in State" of Dr. Parker. Is this in keeping either with the modesty or the true dignity of a minister of the Gospel?

THE Bishop of London has announced his intention to take proceedings, under the Church Discipline Act of 1840, against the Rev. H. M. M. Evans, vicar of St. Michael's, Shoreditch, for persistence after warning in the use of certain extra-liturgical services. Procedure in such a case depends partly upon the election of the bishop either to deal with it himself or to send it to the Court of Arches, partly upon the consent, at certain stages, of the defendant; but in any event there is a last appeal to the Judical Committee of the Privy Council, and we hope that if the case is fought at all it will not be withheld from the decision of the final authority. Mr. Evans has published an explanation of his position.

What we have been contending for during all these years (he writes) has not been ceremonial, but the doctrine of which it is the natural expression. . . . The point is not the legality or otherwise of such devotions as the rosary, benediction, the cult of the sacred heart, &c., or of such ceremonial adjuncts as incense and vestments, but of the right publicly to teach the doctrines they symbolise. . . . I once offered to adopt the black gown in the pulpit, and to take the north end in celebrating the Holy Communion if my doctrinal teaching were authorised. But my diocesan replied, "That is not what is wanted."

MR. EVANS sadly contrasts his own unhappy lot with that of dignitaries who deny "the personality of God and the reality of the resurrection," or "the truth of the virgin birth of our Lord" or "the inspiration of the canonical books." "Surely," he exclaims, "such teachings are not the less dangerous because they find no expression in ceremonial observances." What he desires above all things is a collective episcopal pronouncement on the doctrine of the Church of England. Such a pronouncement, however, would be binding upon nobody who did not voluntarily accept it. The doctrine of the Church of England is defined by an Act of Parliament, to which the Book of Common Prayer is appended as a schedule. There are only two valid authorities for its interpretation; one is the individual conscience, which binds only the individual soul; the other is the supreme court of law in ecclesiastical matters, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. The Broad Church views which Mr. Evans describes as a series of denials have already, in Colenso's case, been pronounced by that Court to be not illegal in the Church of England. The bishops may indeed, like the Bishop of London, refuse to ordain men who profess them; but they have no means of restraining men who profess them after ordination. Over ritual, and especially over extra-liturgical services, they have a large power of control. Their decisions, however, even in this field, are subject to revision by the Judicial Committee, whose uniform policy has been to admit as legal everything which was not, in their opinion, plainly proven to be illegal.

THE fourth lecture in Mr. Stopford Brooke's present course at University College, on Thursday week, was on William Blake (1757-1827), the previous lecture having dealt with Collins and Gray. In Blake's first volume (1777) Mr. Brooke said there was a cry of dismay at the death of poetry in England. Cowper and Burns had not yet begun, and with the artificial poetry of his time Blake had nothing to do; but with his cry the lovely waters of natural song—simplicity and passion, broke forth again. He gloried in the work of the Elizabethans, and himself was herald of the new poetry that was coming. His four poems addressed to the seasons have the modern literary touch, with the personal love of Nature, which is the special mark of the poetry of the nineteenth century. His lines on the Evening Star are more modern than Wordsworth, as modern as Keats and Tennyson.

THE greatest change Blake brought into the poetry of his time, Mr. Brooke said, was in his songs. In them was truly the first sounding of the natural lyric since the Elizabethan songs, whose spirit he reproduced. A perfect song came like the sudden unfolding of the flower of the water-lily, and Blake, rising as it were out of the deep, abandoned himself to every natural feeling, seeing beauty and glory everywhere, without self-consciousness, a very child, yet with a man's power, and made songs in his heart all day long. He touched the sunshine of life, and its deep shadows, with the quaintness of a child. The world, gloomy with money-making, did not trouble him; he lived to be nearly seventy, always poor, always untamed, always happy.

BLAKE is known chiefly by his "Songs of Innocence," published in 1789, when the roar of the French Revolution was in the ears of the world. The book began the poetry of daily life in the common world. In its choice of homely subjects and naturalness of expression it was prelude to the Lyrical Ballads. That gives him his historical place in English poetry. People said Wordsworth was a fool, and Blake was mad, but the whole atmosphere of his book was a guileless joy. His songs are as good, sweet, musical and tender as the song of the mother-bird over her nestlings when the summer wind is playing in the trees. Blake's "Songs of Experience" five years later, in contrast to the other book, are as dark as midnight. Their expression of the experience of misery is as exaggerated in its gloom as his expression of joy on the other hand. They come out of a child's heart, but with the creative imagination of the man.

WITHIN the last two years attention has repeatedly been drawn to the crying need for better housing and sanitation, not only for the large towns, but also for the scattered villages and hamlets where, as in many parts, a dwindling agricultural population has no decent room to live. Few but those who have sought cottage accommodation in rural districts know how difficult a matter it is to obtain a place to live in, good and bad alike being equally scarce. Water supplies are often polluted or almost wanting, and drains and sewers generally in an insanitary condition. It is the earnest desire of the recently formed Rural Housing and Sanitation Association to bring such cases of sanitary neglects before some influential body, such as the district council or the local authorities, and to use its influence to have the defects rectified or abated. It should be remembered that in country districts there is the very strongest dislike, even amongst sympathisers, to take any active part in the reforming of their own neighbourhood, and for this reason it needs an independent society to do any good work in a neglected village. The association will endeavour to collect authentic information, to rouse public opinion, to receive complaints and to give advice or other suitable help to those living in rural districts and suffering from sanitary neglects which they know no means of rectifying without outside help. The association aims at making the present law take effect, rather than at promoting fresh legislation. The scope of its action must at first be confined to the home counties, and it invites complaints of sanitary neglects to be sent to the secretary, Rural Housing and Sanitation Association, 59, Berners-street, Oxford-street, London, W. All communications will be treated with the strictest confidence.

MR. E. HOWARD, as the newly-appointed Mayor of Bexhill, presided on Tuesday week at the annual meeting of the local branch of the B. and F. Bible Society, and delivered a very useful address, in which he pleaded for more confidence in the inherent strength and supreme worth of the Bible, and insisted that criticism should not be feared, but welcomed. "Let us not resent," he said, "but welcome every bit of light that comes to us about the origin and the formation of the Scriptures, for truth is one and indivisible, and every truth that comes ought to be welcomed by us with rejoicing, for it must be the truth of God, who is the only source of it."

A WRITER in the Free Methodist approves of the suggestion that the Band of Hope meeting, "a meeting which many will own is difficult to manage," should practically become a week-evening meeting of the Sunday-school, should be managed by the school authorities, and attended by the teachers. The idea is that this would widen the number of topics which might then be discussed, and that the week-night acquaintance of teachers and scholars would add considerable strength in the Sunday-school. If such meetings were only possible, if only they were felt to be inevitable, they might revolutionise both the Band of Hope and the Sunday-school. Some school more venturous than others must lead the way.

THE late Rev. Hugh Price Hughes was the founder and for eighteen years editor of the Methodist Times, "a journal of Religious and Social Movement." At a meeting of the directors on Saturday week, Mr. Percy W. Bunting, M.A., editor of the Contemporary Review, who has long been associated with Mr. Price Hughes in his West London Mission, agreed to take over the editorial responsibility of the paper for the present, until a permanent appointment can be made.

SIR FRANK GREEN, who was Lord Mayor at the time of Queen Victoria's death, passed away on Wednesday morning, after a brief illness, at his residence in Belsize Park-gardens. Born at Maidstone, in 1835, he established himself as a paper merchant in the City, and having entered the Council in 1878, took a leading part in its affairs. It will be remembered that Sir Frank Green was the Lord Mayor who entertained the National Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers at the Guildhall.

MOLECULES, ATOMS AND CORPUSCLES.

II.

IN THE INQUIRER of Nov. 22 I gave some of the reasons for making use of the atomic hypothesis, pointing out that at present it stands alone in enabling us to explain a very large number of phenomena. But, of course, it is still a hypothesis, and wildly improbable as any other explanation may appear to us now, yet in the background of our minds we must keep the idea that it is a hypothesis, and that some other explanation might be possible.

For the present, however, let us take it as established. Let us assume that atoms and molecules do produce the effects ascribed to them, and let us see what conclusions we can draw as to their motion, number, size and weight. I shall try to show that if our preliminary assumptions are granted, then these conclusions are no guess work, but are inevitable.

The Speed at which Gas Molecules Travel.

It is much easier to give a molecular description of the gaseous form of matter than of the liquid or solid forms. For in the liquid or solid forms the molecules are packed so close together that they are entangled with each other all the time in all sorts of irregular groups. In a gas, however, the distances between the molecules are on the average so great compared with their size, or, rather, their spheres of action, that they hardly act on each other except during the brief moments when they collide against each other.

To account for the pressure of a gas we are to suppose that its molecules are in rapid motion hither and thither, bombarding and rebounding from any surface exposed to the gas. This bombardment produces the pressure. It is quite an easy problem in mechanics to calculate the speed at which the molecules travel to account for the observed pressure. Thus there is a rain of air molecules down on the page on which I am now writing, producing a pressure of about 14 lbs. on the square inch. Now we may think of the molecules as moving in six directions—down, up, right, left, to and fro, so that only one-sixth of the air is moving downwards. We know the weight of air in a cubic inch, and one-sixth of that weight. How fast must it be rushing down and bouncing up again to produce a pressure of 14 lbs. on each square inch? The answer is about a quarter of a mile per second, this enormous speed making up for the lightness of the gas. In hydrogen, a much lighter gas than air, the speed is still greater, amounting to over a mile per second. As the temperature rises the speed increases, but very slowly, so that even in the atmosphere of the sun the molecules only move perhaps five or six times as fast as they do in our atmosphere.

Diffusion of Gases.

The rapid diffusion of gases is an obvious consequence of these high speeds. When a gas-tap is turned on without lighting the jet, the gas is soon unpleasantly obvious all over the room. The gas molecules dart out from the pipe with a speed of, say, half a mile a second, and the wonder is, not that the diffusion is so rapid, but that it is not instantaneous.

Here, however, we must bring into consideration the collisions of the molecules with each other. Let us follow in imagination a molecule which starts from the gas-jet straight across the room. It goes a very little way before it bangs up against another molecule which drives it back. It moves back a little way, when another knocks it to the right. Then a little way and it is knocked upwards, and so on, and its path is an utterly irregular zig-zag. We may illustrate this process of diffusion on a large scale by imagining that a body of people—say here in Birmingham—suddenly make up their minds to journey to Utopia, and that they spread out in all directions in their quest. If they walked steadily on at four miles an hour some of them would arrive in London in about thirty hours. But now suppose that each traveller asks the way to Utopia of everyone he meets, and that he follows the course pointed out to him by the ignorance of his informant. Imagine how he would first be directed north, then south, now backwards, now forwards, up this road, down that lane. It might well be thirty days or even thirty months before any straggler turned up in London.

The Distance which the Molecules Travel between Collisions.

The illustration shows the difficulties with which a molecule has to contend when it wishes to keep to a straight course. Nevertheless, if we could mark the molecules near a given point and watch them, we should find that they would gradually spread from that point, or diffuse, and there are various ways in which their rate of spreading can be observed—as for instance, if we heat one part of the gas and measure the rate at which the heated molecules share their extra energy with their neighbours. The slowness of this diffusion as compared with the great speed of the molecules suggests this question: How often do the molecules collide in each second, and how far do they travel between each two collisions, if moving at the rate of a quarter of a mile per second they only diffuse at the observed slow rates? This is merely a mathematical problem, and the answer is, that an air molecule makes about five thousand million collisions per second, and moves only about a two hundred and fifty thousandth part of an inch on the average between each succeeding pair of collisions. If the air is rarefied, of course, the collisions decrease, and in the exceedingly rarefied gas in an X-ray tube the molecule may move an inch or so at a time and only make some few thousand collisions per second.

The Number of Molecules in a Cubic Inch of Air.

Knowing the speed and the distance run between collisions it is possible to take another step and to calculate the number of the molecules. But this is only possible if we make another assumption, one, however, which it is difficult to suppose is very wide of the truth. This is that when a gas is liquefied or frozen its molecules are packed close together, or rather that what we have called their spheres of action are all in contact.

Let us imagine a room, ten feet every way, full of air. If the air were all liquefied it would form a puddle on the floor but a tenth of an inch deep. If this were all frozen and gathered into a ball, the ball of solid air would be but little more than a foot in diameter, and in this we imagine all the atoms huddled close together. We have now to put this question: Into how many equal little balls must this big ball be broken so that if they are scattered all through the room any one of them setting off on its travels will meet another every two hundred and fifty thousandth of an inch. Evidently the subdivision will have to be carried very far. For even suppose it is broken up into a million parts there will be one to every cubic inch or so, each about one-tenth of an inch in diameter, and one might wander many inches or even feet before meeting another. Subdivide each of these into a million, and still they will only be about one-thousandth of an inch in diameter and one-hundredth of an inch apart, like a fine mist, and a drop could easily pass among the rest for some tenths of an inch without meeting a neighbour. Exact calculation shows that the big ball would have to be divided into little spheres each about one twenty millionth of an inch in diameter, and in each cubic inch there would be about a thousand million million million of them. Now we know the weight of a cubic inch of air—it is about one-third of a grain. So that we know the weight of a single molecule of air, at least roughly. It is not likely to be more than two or three times less or two or three times greater than the value found. And it is to be noticed that the only assumptions made are (1) that molecules exist, (2) that by their motion they produce pressure, and (3) that when liquefied they are close together. All the rest is experiment and calculation, allowing no room for supposition.

But the value ultimately found for the weight of a molecule of air is too utterly minute for our understanding. Perhaps its smallness may be brought home to us thus: If we put a molecule of air and a half-pound weight side by side they would bear to each other nearly the same proportion that the half-pound bears to the weight of the whole earth. And a hydrogen atom is twenty-eight times lighter than the average air molecule!

The Corpuscles of which the Atoms are Built.

Minute though the atom is, the researches which were started by the discovery of the X-rays a few years ago have led to the idea that the atom itself can be divided into still smaller bits. When the electric discharge is taking place in a very highly exhausted tube these still smaller bits, the corpuscles, are somehow broken off the atoms, and are flying across the tube. When they hit an opposing surface the tiny shocks produce minute quivers in the surrounding medium, which spread around and form the X-rays. They are of the same nature as light, but too short to affect our sight, though they can act on a photographic plate or a fluorescent screen. The very minuteness of the corpuscles tends to support this explanation, for we are obliged to think of the X-ray waves as exceedingly short, and such as would arise rather from the shock of little corpuscles than of big molecules.

When an electric discharge takes place through a liquid a stream of atoms moves through the liquid, so many atoms for so much electric charge. So definite is the relation that the charge per atom can be calculated, and it is always the same for all atoms which are chemically equivalent. But Professor J. J. Thomson found that in the stream of matter producing the X-rays the matter is much less in proportion to the electricity than the calculated charge per atom would require. Thus he found that in the case of hydrogen it was only necessary to suppose that one five-hundredth of the atom was moving along with the charge. Further, whatever be the kind of gas in the X-ray tube, the stream of matter rushing across the tube appears to be the same in kind. The hydrogen atom, the oxygen atom, the nitrogen atom all produce the same kind of material in the electrified stream. When Professor Thomson made this great discovery he was led to put forth the hypothesis that the atoms are all complex, all built up of the same kind of little body or corpuscle, some 500 of them going to make the hydrogen atom, 8,000 to the oxygen atom, 50,000 to the silver atom, and so on. So minute are these corpuscles that they can and do travel through metal. When an X-ray tube is closed at one end by a thin aluminium plate the air cannot get in, but the corpuscles can get out and can be detected in the outside air. In metals generally these corpuscles appear to be very abundant, and Professor Thomson explains the high conductivity of metals for electricity and for heat by their aid. In a heated body, for example, they serve as carriers of energy, and being so minute can pass fairly freely through the interspaces between the bigger molecules, taking their energy from hotter to colder parts of the metal.

But perhaps the most remarkable point in this new hypothesis is the support it gives to the idea that matter and electricity are identical, or rather that electricity is but an aspect of matter, an idea which has long been held in a vague form. Now it becomes precise. I think Professor Thomson would say that negatively electrified matter is matter with an excess of corpuscles, positively electrified matter, matter from which some corpuscles have been torn off. It is the attempt of the negatively electrified matter to get rid of its excess of corpuscles which produces the electric forces it exhibits, and if a positively electrified body comes up and takes off the excess both are satisfied, and we speak of the electricity as discharged. But the corpuscles, the units of electric action, are still there, and it appears probable that the electric forces between them may be used to explain some of the properties of matter, perhaps even gravitation itself. The smaller a body is, however, the larger is the space required for its description, and it would need far more than is at my disposal to give any adequate account of the new views opened out by this remarkable hypothesis. I can only say that it bids fair to take as important a place in the work of the century just beginning as did Dalton's form of the atomic hypothesis, enunciated a hundred years ago, in the century just closed.

LITERATURE.

ADVENT ADDRESSES*

DR. WARSCHAUER's little book, on "The Coming of Christ," published by Mr. Philip Green, comes to us in good season, for it contains eight addresses delivered to his congregation at Oakfield-road, Clifton, on the four Advent Sundays of two successive seasons, looking forward to the Christmas festival. The addresses are practical in aim, and earnest in the tone of their religious appeal, seeking to make a present reality of Christian discipleship, from the point of view thus described in the preface :—

> The preacher's general aim has been to express the conviction that, when the most thorough-going criticism has said its last word, the supremacy of Jesus still stands uncontested—the Man of Nazareth remains the "Great Chief of faithful souls," the Captain of our salvation, the supreme Revealer of God.
> The addresses are not controversial or unduly argumentative for the occasion of their delivery, but they naturally suggest questions to those who are not already at one with the speaker in his point of view. In the present day a need most keenly felt is of reality in religious life and utterance, and he deserves our thanks who makes Christ more real, and gives us fresh insight into the meaning of our discipleship and the fundamental truths of the Christian life.
> Dr. Warschauer in these addresses pictures the world's hunger for a deeper, more spiritual life, a closer communion with God, as our Father. He pleads that this was satisfied in Christ; and the deeper life in him kindled it in others, and has ever since given men courage to believe, and live themselves as children of God.
> This is the life which Jesus came to bring, which it was his mission to kindle by his teachings and by his personality alike—the life which consists in the knowledge of God. His teachings, indeed, were pervaded by a serene assurance of his Father's love, which could not fail to be contagious, to give birth to a similar assurance on the part of his hearers. . . . As we perceive him travelling with sure and unerring step along a path which to our eye at the best of times is hidden by mists and defects of sight; as we listen to his references, ever marked by absolute simplicity, to his and our Father in heaven; as we let ourselves be instructed by him how to pray, something of his own certainty communicates itself to our hearts: a sense of God, a knowledge of Him passing all that can be gained by the understanding, possesses the soul, and with that knowledge a new consciousness of life in Him. No man giveth but such things as he hath; and Jesus, himself overflowing with the life of the Spirit, supremely and imperturbably conscious of God, brought and imparted that life and consciousness which were pre-eminently his, to such as would behold and listen and believe.
> That passage fairly represents the teaching which will be found in these addresses. Where we find ourselves chiefly questioning is in passages which seem to imply a radical incapacity in ordinary human nature to attain to higher religious truth, and affirm that our knowledge of the Divine Fatherhood is taken on trust, because of what we see in Christ. When Dr. Warschauer says of that great truth, "We could not have discovered it for ourselves" (p. 129), and again, "We could neither have discovered it nor are we able, except in isolated moments, to verify it from our own experience. We take it on trust from Jesus, who is the guarantor and the guarantee of our belief" (p. 183), he seems to us to make much too positive assertions. We do not know by what other ways we might have been led to the conviction of the Divine Fatherhood. And, indeed, if in isolated moments we can verify it for ourselves, why not in the constant experience of a humble, trusting and loving life? Dr. Warschauer says: "The doctrine of the Fatherhood of God reposes on Christ as its originator, Christ as its foundation." On the contrary, we believe that the doctrine was being shaped in human experience, as witness many of the Psalms, before Christ came, and that he simply perfected the doctrine through the more complete realisation of his own life. His great power in our religious life is in the fact, not that we take things on trust from him, but that the germs of the same life, which was in him, are in us, and are quickened into life by the touch of his sympathy, so that we come to know for ourselves the great spiritual truths by which he lived.
> One other point we will note. Dr. Warschauer, quoting from the Fourth Gospel, says it is of small relevance comparatively whether the words were actually spoken by Jesus; "the only real question for us to consider is whether the words constitute a correct description of his work." But surely it is of the utmost consequence to know whether the sayings in the Fourth Gospel are actually the words of Jesus or not. As used by disciples to express their conception of the spirit of his ministry they may be very beautiful and helpful, whereas on his own lips they might be unnatural and out of harmony with his actual character.

HEROD, AND OTHERS.

THE "History of Herod,"* which Mr John Vickers has revised for re-issue, has met with but little appreciation, we fear, so far, and with much less than it deserves. A good deal of cheap and easy abuse has been heaped upon it by critics who take refuge from the challenge to revise the long-standing verdict of popular history in pleasant ridicule of the author's enthusiastic advocacy of his client's case. Notwithstanding all this, a candid examination shows that, while the work cannot be classed among the monuments of dry erudition which abound in connection with biblical subjects, it results from an earnest and not unsuccessful attempt to present in a vivid way the great Judean as he was, and to deliver his picture from the distortion which it suffers when we look at it through the spectacles of Josephus, without allowing for aberration. At any rate it may be safely said that those whose notions of Herod are chiefly derived from the lurid—and quite fanciful—glimpses afforded in the first Gospel's account of the Infancy will receive a flood of light when they turn to Mr. Vickers' book. Of late, as everyone knows, more than one poet has found in Herod's career a subject worthy of his muse; and since Mr. Stephen Phillips' Herod appeared on the stage it cannot be but that many play-goers are ready and willing to learn something more of the king than that powerful drama allowed. A sober judgment will probably recoil somewhat from the liberal commendations and generous excuses occasionally offered by Mr. Vickers, yet on the whole he is a far safer guide than those who have found in Herod simply a monster of cruel madness. Mr. W. J. Woodhouse, of St. Andrews, writing in the Encyclopædia Biblica, says:—

* Williams and Norgate. Pp. 391. 6s.

We cannot here discuss the question whether Herod is rightly called "the great." Certainly it is not easy to be strictly fair towards him; but so much must be clear, that, judged by the standard of material benefits conferred, few princes have less reason to shrink from the test.

Leaving the reader to accept Mr. Vickers' help in revising the general estimate of this singular prince, we shall probably best illustrate the style and general tone of the book by the following quotation, which has also its other uses:—

Though we have long been accustomed to regard this ancient ruler as a monster, when once the clouds of myth that have hung over his figure disperse, and afford us a clearer view, he is found to be, after all, a man very much like ourselves. It is indisputable that, both in respect to his merits and his feelings, he possessed many traits of our common English character. We have always been considered a strong, frank, courageous, free-spending people, and are at the same time a blundering people, ever getting into difficulties for the want of a little forecast, and, while needlessly distrustful in some matters, being easily circumvented by those who know how to take advantage of our blind side. Herod was such, and if it were so arranged that he should re-appear after twenty centuries with another name, and take up his abode with us, there can be little doubt that he would soon be thoroughly at home and in congenial society. Passionately fond of athletic sports, able to ride well to hounds, command a cavalry regiment, direct engineering operations, and deliver a telling speech—he would constitute an admirable specimen of the English country gentleman; and, with his simple Jewish theism, modified by Greek and Latin culture, might pass very well for having received a university education. Indeed, when taken with all his errors and failings, with all his sins and barbarities, it would be difficult to find among the ancients any other individual so nearly allied in disposition and sentiment to ourselves. On observing how readily he listened to calumny, inflicted torture on poor witnesses, and condemned innocent people to death, we may entertain a conceit of being much more enlightened and humane; but it was not so very long ago, when a vain apprehension existed of suffering from the machinations of witches and papists, that judicial wrongs of quite as gross a character were perpetrated in our own country. And, even in recent years, visionary alarms of another kind have occasionally turned us aside from the plain path of rectitude, and induced us to shed much innocent blood. If Herod entertained an unreasonable fear of being poisoned, we are accustomed to indulge in equally groundless misgivings of being invaded—invaded, mind, not by marauding savages, but by Europeans as industrious, civilised and law-abiding as ourselves. And, under the influence of a panic feeling most discreditable to a brave nation, we proceed now and then to anticipate an imaginary aggression, which is to fall on us, by committing a real one; we set about to punish with terrible severity those who are supposed to be plotting our ruin, when it is quite clear that they would not gain, but lose much by carrying out the designs imputed to them, and, unless they were really stark mad, such an extravagant conspiracy could never even enter their minds. The King's political morality will compare favourably with our own, for he was ever courteous to foreigners, non-aggressive, and sincerely devoted to the preservation of peace.

TWO COLLEGE ADDRESSES.*

WE gave, at the time of its delivery, a somewhat full report of Dr. Drummond's valuable address at the opening of the session at Manchester College, Oxford, and now that the address is published, we commend it very warmly to all who are interested, or ought to be interested, in the right principles of Biblical and historical criticism. We are specially glad to see the name of an Oxford bookseller on the title-page. If this should gain for the address wider notice in the University, it cannot fail to sow good seed for the promotion of sound scholarship. We must not repeat here the summary of the address we have already published, but ask our readers to procure and study it for themselves. Copies may be also had in the Book Room at Essex Hall.

Mr. Gordon's address, which we suppose is also purchasable, though no price is given, is on a subject on which he is our first authority, and his account of the Early Nonconformist Academies and their ideal of education is delightful reading. The story of Richard Frankland's quiet heroism should never be forgotten, and one thinks the better of Charles II. that he could be touched even for a moment by Frankland's dignified rebuke, to whom, after an interview at which not the courtier but the earnest Christian gentleman and minister of God had spoken, he said, turning back as he went into the Council Chamber, "I thank you, sir; I thank you."

Mr. Gordon gives many interesting and some amusing particulars as to the studies in the old academies. Thus at Findern, Thomas Hill (who died in 1720) expected his students to sing their Psalms, not merely as rendered into Latin, but in Greek verse too. A tutor of a yet severer stamp made his pupils sing them in the original Hebrew! Modern literature was not altogether neglected in the later academies, but at Rathmel it had no place in Frankland's course of studies. Mr. Gordon, however, quotes the gossiping diary of one of the students, as telling how "Mr. Frankland's daughters" to some "extent supplied this defect, for, he says, they led me to read poetry and novels, and such like trash." Of this address also we say, get it, and read it all; and in conclusion will quote one significant passage:—

The immediate work of the Nonconformist Academies was to fit and equip men for public duty, not in the ministry alone, but in all the professions; it was to make them thinkers—not closing their minds with fixed opinions, but opening their intelligences, and giving them an impetus towards the acquirement of further knowledge; it was to make them workers for the good of their kind, to train them for the application of knowledge in all the departments of life. Far more was this their aim than to make Nonconformists. They had to deal primarily with a class of people, Nonconformist, already, expelled from the unity of the nation into Nonconformity; and they made it their task to develop in that class the powers of thought and powers of life which would qualify them to fill their places in the work of their country; to do their part in forming its future, to take their share in building up on sound principles its prosperity, to advance its culture, and to ensure its progress. Small wonder that many who were not Nonconformists were ready to avail themselves of an education thus conceived and thus pursued. Nor need we grudge that infusion of new blood into the older institution of religion, for which the Anglican Church stands indebted to able and conspicuous men, made what they were, in the obscurity of the Nonconformist academy. It was not Oxford, it was Tewkesbury, that nurtured the mind of Butler.

SHORT NOTICES.

WE have received, and reserve for full notice, the first volume of the Cambridge Modern History, the great work planned by the late Lord Acton, and now appearing under the editorship of Dr. A. W. Ward, G. W. Prothero, and Stanley Leathes. The first volume deals with "The Renaissance," and has an introductory note by the late Bishop of London. The sections are contributed by various writers, on such subjects as "The New World," "The Ottoman Conquest," "Italy and her Invaders," "Florence," "Venice," "Germany and the Empire," "Hungary." "Rome and the Temporal Power" is by Dr. Richard Garnett. The concluding chapter is on "Catholic Europe on the Eve of the Reformation." (Cambridge University Press. 16s. net.)

The annual volumes of Good Words and the Sunday Magazine are varied in their contents and interesting as ever. The latter contains Miss Stone's narrative "In the Grip of the Brigands," and monthly features of special interest, with their illustrations, on "How the World Goes Round," and "Men of the Month." Through the volume of Good Words runs a series of Bible Readings on "The Wisdom of James the First," by the Bishop of Ripon (now also separately published), a "Life of Lord Salisbury," by F. D. How, and some well illustrated papers on "Minute Marvels of Nature." Mr. W. G. Collingwood contributes some Ruskin papers. Mr. Stopford Brooke's papers on "Browning's Treatment of Nature" are now embodied in his book. (Isbister and Co. 7s. 6d. each.)

The Bishop of Ripon's papers on The Wisdom of James the First, reprinted from Good Words, in a slightly extended form, and with the text of the Epistle printed from the Revised Version, makes an interesting volume of helpful comment on that practical Epistle. (Isbister and Co. 5s.)

In ample time for Christmas comes the Rosebud Annual for 1903, maintaining its well-known character for the amusement of the little ones (James Clarke and Co. 4s.), and there is also the Louis

Wain Nursery Book for those who are not tired of those interminable cats. (James Clarke and Co. 1s.)

The Unitarian Biographical Dictionary, edited by the Rev. George Carter, like the late Robert Spears's book of "Unitarian Worthies," is a work of the best intentions, and its "Short notices of the Lives of Noteworthy Unitarians and kindred Thinkers, brought down to the year 1900," gather together a large amount of interesting information. That all the information is correct would be too much to affirm, and the principle of selection by which certain people are included and others left out is often puzzling; but there are doubtless many Unitarians who will be glad to have the book. (Unitarian Christian Publishing Office, 5, Furnival street, Holborn, E.C. 1s. 6d. net; by post, 1s. 8d.)

Leaves from a Lay Preacher's Ministry, by Thomas Elliot, contains a selection of sermons preached in the Highgate Hill Unitarian Christian Church during the interregnum prior to the present minister's settlement. The sermons are published by request of those who have warmly appreciated Mr. Elliot's services, and furnish a good example of what an earnest layman can do in the pulpit. (Unitarian Christian Publishing Company, 5, Furnival-street, Holborn, E.C. 1s. 6d. net)

The World's Work, a new shilling monthly, edited by Mr. Henry Norman, M.P., challenges attention as "an illustrated magazine of national efficiency and social progress." It promises to meet a need long felt in England—the need of a continuous record of all kinds of work, industrial, municipal, social, artistic, parliamentary, and literary, written by experts, and infused with a truly progressive spirit. In paper, type, illustrations and cover it is long since we met with anything so entirely pleasing as this first number. The design of the cover is exceptionally clever—we are sorry to miss the artist's signature. The portraits are good, and the illustrations are chosen on a principle too rarely followed—viz., with a view to assisting the reader's imagination just where it needs assistance. There are some new features of advertisements, which we find a little confusing. In the editorial summary, among other good things, is a notice of the Education Bill, which we commend to our readers, and the subject is extended in an article by Mr. Macnamara (the first of a series) and a description of a day in a London Board-school. Commercial interests are represented by papers on South American Trade, German Problems, the Atlantic Combine, and a particularly luminous article by Sir Christopher Furness on "How British Trade is Handicapped." The political situation is represented by the Mediterranean Problem, and by Mr. Hoare's "Liberalism in the Twentieth Century." There are lighter articles on the science of football, and the effect of mechanical music on the art, and the progress of the book world. We are glad to note that a section will be devoted each month to various aspects of woman's work. We cannot do better in recommending this new venture to our readers' attention than quote a sentence from the Editor's preface:—"The nation's need is for a higher standard of general knowledge and aim, and a deeper sense of individual responsibility."

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

The Story of "Slop," the Shetland Shepherd Dog.

A BOY, fourteen years old, who lived in Unst, the most northerly of the Shetland Isles, had a black and tan shepherd-dog given to him, whom he began to educate and to teach him many things, but so kindly and gently that the dog loved his young master dearly, and it was his greatest pleasure to win a pat and a kind word, which showed he was pleased with him. Slop learnt to swim; and then he was taught to be an obedient and faithful messenger. So clever did the dog become that, when miles away from home fishing in some lonely loch, his master used to tie a little written message round his neck, saying, "Home, Slop! home quick!" and was quite sure that Slop would carry it to his master's family, and just wait for a pat and a kind word, "To your master, Slop!" and bring the return message back tied round his neck, as fast as feet would carry him.

One autumn day Slop and his master rowed out across a broad bay to a low, uninhabited island that was covered by the sea at high tide. They landed, and the boy took the end of the long rope which was usually fastened by a ring bolt to the boat, and made it fast to the rocks. The boat swung off from the rocks into clear water; and, to his horror, he saw the further end of the rope run over the bows and drop into the sea, for it had been loosened from the bolt. The boat drifted out over the waves. The boy was a prisoner. Sitting down, he covered his face with his hands; he could not swim, and the tide would rise and drown him. Slop laid a paw on his knee as if to ask what was the matter. "Oh, Slop," was the answer, "You can get to shore because you can swim; but I can't. What will they think at home?" At the word "Home," Slop ran eagerly to the water's edge as if to say "send me." The boy tore a leaf out of his pocket-book and wrote, "I am on the Scarta Scerry, boat adrift. Send help instantly, or it will be too late." Then he fastened the paper into his handkerchief, tied it firmly to the dog's collar, and said "Slop, home. Now, Slop, will you be sure to take my message home and quick?" Off bounded the dog to the water's edge; but his master's voice called him back, and Slop turned and sprang into his arms. "Slop, your master's life depends upon you! Brave dog! Good dog! Home, Slop, and quick!" Two bounds and a bark, and the faithful dog was in the water swimming to the nearest shore.

Think what the boy's thoughts must have been. Perhaps Slop might not be faithful; perhaps he might lose the message as he swam; perhaps the island might be covered by the tide before help could come.

Time passed; the water rose gradually; at length it washed his feet. But hark! there was a sound—the strokes of oars rapidly rowing; and round the point darted a boat with four eager rowers, and in the bow, with ears erect, and trembling with excitement, faithful Slop, who sprang out when he saw his master, and with dripping coat rushed up to him joyously barking.

This world is sometimes likened to a school. And why? Because we all have lessons to learn which will make us better and wiser. How glad we should be that we can all help one another to learn these lessons. Boys and girls who try bravely to do what is right spread such a good spirit round them that younger children, watching them, learn to do likewise. One unselfish person helps to make his neighbours kind and forbearing; and he who is industrious and works hard at his lessons sets an example which many others end in following. And now to go back to our story. See how the shepherd-dog loved his kind master who taught him lessons that made him wise and useful. Let us remember that children can not only help one another thus, but they can, in gentleness and kindness, teach the dear, dumb creatures around them, who prove themselves so faithful to their kind human friends. "God uses us to help each other so."

FRANCES E. COOKE.

IT has been said that we have no message for the poor, and that we have no poor in our churches. The latter illusion would be dispelled by active participation in the work of our Northern churches, and our Domestic Missions should speedily destroy the former misapprehension. At the present time both of the Manchester Missions are crippled for want of funds and workers. The children crowd in to the Sunday-schools in numbers beyond the capacity of the buildings. The services are well attended; the energies and time of the missionaries and of other capable and devoted workers are overtaxed; the poor's purse is nearly empty, and the demands on it are great. The poor respond to the efforts that are made to help them. But workers and money are wanted in greater abundance. If, in the Manchester District, those who have leisure or money, but who doubt the need for the work of the missions or its efficiency, or who are under any uncertainty whether they have a gospel for the people, could hear the missionaries' monthly reports and join the committee in their deliberations, such uncertainty would vanish and their pockets and hearts would be opened. The treasurer is Mr. David A. Little, of Hatherley, Portland-road, Bowdon, and he or the secretary, Rev. W. E. George, of Swinton, would gladly give information to any who are disposed to help.

THE Ruskin Hall movement is making some progress. At Stockport a very suitable house has been given rent free; and already the warden, Mr. F. Bower Alcock, M.A., has gathered a good number of students for his courses of lectures, and a fair number of men have recognised the advantage of living at such a place while carrying on their daily work. Residence costs 14s. a week. Lectures are given on history, education, and logic by the Warden, and there are classes for the study of French and German. A good beginning has been made. Meanwhile the Manchester movement is unfortunately without a home, although while it had the use of a house at moderate rent its usefulness was manifest; and so soon as a building can be obtained in a suitable position and at a charge which can be met, there are men ready to continue the work, who appreciate the opportunities and are willing to serve.

THE IDEAL CHURCH.

DR. JOHN HUNTER, of the King's Weigh House Congregational Church, gave a striking address on Friday week at a meeting of the Churchmen's Union, in St. Martin's Vestry Hall, Charing-cross, the subject being "A Plea for a comprehensive Church from the point of view of a Broad Church Nonconformist." What ought to be the spirit, aims, and methods, Dr. HUNTER asked at the outset, of a Church worthy to be called a "Christ's Church," and the answer he found in the universal sympathies of CHRIST, in which no narrowness or intolerance could have a place. "Whosoever shall do the will of my Father in heaven," was the word of JESUS. Exclusiveness was the mark of the Pharisee. The intolerance of superior goodness or of orthodoxy could find no favour with CHRIST. There was nothing ecclesiastical about him. The kingdom of GOD rather than the Church was the central thought with him, yet the Church was bound to come, as the company of faithful disciples gathered in his name, in sympathy with his spirit and purpose and under his leadership. "Jesus instituted little," said VINET, "but inspired much." To him no outward rites were essential. In the common acceptation of the term he laid down no creed. In the Gospels we find the Lord's Prayer, not the Lord's Creed. It was life for which he cared, the life with GOD, in the spirit of sonship, in love and self-sacrifice—not a metaphysical theory, but a moral temper and spiritual affection.

Thus the Church of CHRIST is simply that part of mankind which is baptised with the spirit of CHRIST. There is one Church, though there may be many folds. No ideal outline of a Church could be found in the New Testament, nor was the ideal realised in the Apostolic age or any other. "The Church," indeed, had often proved the bane of Christianity, and its records were painful reading. The representatives of CHRIST had often misrepresented him. Old Jewish formalism and Pagan superstition entered into the forms of Christianity. The visible triumphs of the Church were seldom its true successes. Through the centuries earnest men had often been forced to be anti-ecclesiastical, so as not to be anti-Christian.

Thus Dr. HUNTER proceeded through his criticism of the visible Church to approach the ideal of a truly Catholic Church, as a union of souls in spiritual liberty. The light, he said, was not all in one place. The Spirit works in invisible ways, and beneath all diversities of doctrine, order and experience must be sought the Communion of Saints. That ideal Church of CHRIST was not an outward institution but a spirit of life. Yet he believed that organised Christianity was on the eve of a great Reformation. The edict of comprehension had gone forth. The ideal, seen in the dreams of the prophets, was coming nearer through the breaking down of venerable prejudices, the less importance attached to forms of organisation, the widening recognition of the unity of spiritual affection—unity of spirit in the bond of peace. Everywhere it was coming to be more fully recognised that spiritual worship, and doing the will of GOD, were the essential things.

Thus the Church must be as comprehensive as the Christian life, the life "hid with Christ in God." Faith in CHRIST'S way of life was the one condition of admission. Its order, therefore, could not be uniformity of ritual or doctrine, but a common sympathy, aspiration and purpose.

In contrast with this, the High Church temper was not a Catholic temper. Crying out against schism, it was itself schismatic. The note of a true "Christ's Church" was inclusion, not exclusion. Why, Dr. HUNTER asked, should not the bond sufficient to bind a man to CHRIST be sufficient to bind him to his fellow Christians?

Defining more particularly his ideal of a Church comprehensive and catholic, Dr. HUNTER said that such also would be the character of its worship, meeting a variety of needs, and appealing to all forms of spiritual life. The order of worship should be partly fixed in familiar liturgical forms, but always with freedom also for the expression of the feeling and aspiration and needs of the moment. That was essential for those who believed in the living inspirations of GOD. The comprehensive Church would have in its worship as little as possible of that which divides men.

The ideal Church of CHRIST, he added, would come not through any artificial agency or attempt at outward accommodation, but through a deepening sense of common faith and of the supreme importance of the Christian spirit. Whatever their present ecclesiastical position, they might in that spirit already belong to the Catholic Church of JESUS CHRIST.

Such in bare outline were the main thoughts of this eloquent address. It left one wishing that it had been heard not merely by a group of liberals in religion, but that in every quarter of the Christian world its searching questions might be pressed home and its lessons taken to heart.

A BIRTHDAY GREETING.

Grow old along with me!
The best is yet to be,
The last of life, for which the first was made:
Our times are in His hand
Who saith "A whole I planned,
Youth shows but half; trust God: see all nor be afraid!"

THOSE great words, put by her friend ROBERT BROWNING into the mouth of the old Rabbi, we recall now, and offer them to FRANCES POWER COBBE as a good motto for our birthday greeting to her, on the summit of her eighty years.

Midway in the vista of her memories are those scenes in distant Florence, when for the first time she took the hand of THEODORE PARKER, on his death-bed, to whom she owed so much, and then stood sorrowfully by his grave, bringing her bunch of lilies of the valley, the flower that he loved, and joined with a full heart in that solemn service, of which the words were simply the reading of the Beatitudes. It was in those days also that she learned to value BROWNING'S friendship, who, equally with TENNYSON, shared warmly in many of her generous sympathies, and in particular was to the end a staunch supporter of her passionate protest on behalf of dumb and helpless animals against the cruelties of Vivisection.

Those two great poets, brothers in friendship as in pure devotion to their art, years ago joined the immortals, and both left to us happy and ennobling memories of what old age may be; and in the circle of Miss COBBE'S friendship there were others, and among the chief of them MARY SOMERVILLE and JAMES MARTINEAU, whose beautiful old age, in different generations, blending now in memory with the heavenly light, must add, as we may confidently trust, to the peaceful glow which rests upon her evening time.

And if there are reasons why that peace cannot be as unbroken as we should wish it to be, and the battle of devoted years is not yet ended, we will recall those other lines of ROBERT BROWNING'S, as fit reminder of the stronghold of a glorious faith, amid the tragedy and bitter conflict with evil in the world :—

Therefore to whom turn I but to thee, the ineffable Name?
Builder and maker, thou, of houses not made with hands!
What, have fear of change from thee who art ever the same?
Doubt that thy power can fill the heart that thy power expands?
There shall never be one lost good! What was, shall live as before;
The evil is null, is nought, is silence implying sound;

What was good shall be good, with, for evil, so much good more;
On the earth the broken arcs; in the heaven, a perfect round.

To this message of greeting, offered in the confidence of happy friendship, and thus in a public way because we know that we may speak on behalf of many friends in our wide fellowship of liberal religious thought and life, we must be permitted to add some words of tribute and gratitude.

We owe much to Miss COBBE. She has told the story of her lonely struggles in early life, what it cost her to break away, in solitary fidelity to truth, from the evangelical faith in which she had been reared, and to which she was bound by every affection and association of her life. She proved, as ROBERTSON of Brighton afterwards proved in his hour of utter loneliness, that in righteousness there is the sure foundation, and so the soul may be brought back to faith in the living GOD. Miss COBBE found her own way back into the sunlight of the Eternal Goodness, and in time also to a new and deeper faith in the immortal life. In this she was strengthened by the word of THEODORE PARKER, and after his death, we owe to her the standard English edition of his works. Through her own writings she became a helper of many to a new and happier faith in GOD, and an earnest devotion of life to the service of righteousness.

More than forty years ago Miss COBBE became the companion of MARY CARPENTER at Bristol, in her work among the neglected poor. For nearly five years, until crippled by an accident, in school, in workhouse, and the city slums, she gained experience of the darker and more pathetic side of the people's life, which has been put to noble use in her eloquent and earnest advocacy of social and moral reform. An early champion of women's rights and women's duties, she took her full share in securing that great moral advance which has come with the enlarged opportunities of women, both in education and in many forms of public service.

Of her work as an opponent of Vivisection, which has brought to her the heaviest and most painful burden of her life, we must not speak further here than to say that we honour its devotion and look upon it with profound sympathy. It is based on deep moral conviction of what is demanded by the highest interest of our own manhood no less than by the claims of humanity towards helpless and dependent animals. Into the heat of the controversy we do not enter. We offer our earnest tribute to a veteran, in whose labours we recognise a noble courage and self-sacrifice, for whom, even amid the pain of conflict, there must surely be the quiet confidence and happiness of work well done.

For the final word of this greeting we will turn again to that friend in whose ministry, long ago, Miss COBBE found so much happiness and inspiration. He speaks to us now from beyond the veil, yet with the same quiet faith would have us still rejoice to be just where the Divine Will shall ordain, whether in the noon-day heat and stress, or in long evening hours, and not afraid to linger on the upland slope, which looks across the infinite sea towards sunset.

Thus Dr. MARTINEAU speaks to us of "The Messengers of Change."

If, then, the very law of life is a law of change; if every blossom of beauty has its root in fallen leaves; if love, and thought, and hope would faint beneath too constant light, and need for their freshening the darkness and the dews; if it is in losing the transient that we gain the Eternal; then let us shrink no more from sorrow, and sigh no more for rest; but have a genial welcome for vicissitude, and make quiet friends with loss and Death. Through storm and calm, fresh be our courage, and quick our eye, for the various service that may await us. Nay, when God himself turns us not hither and thither, when he sends us no changes for us to receive and consecrate, be it ours to create them for ourselves, by flinging ourselves into generous enterprises and worthy sacrifice; by the stirrings of sleepless aspiration, and all the spontaneous vicissitudes of holy and progressive souls; keeping always the moral spaces round us pure and fresh by the constant thought of truth and the frequent deed of love. And then, when, for us too, death closes the great series of mortal changes, the past will lie behind us green and sweet as Eden, and the future before us in the light of eternal peace. Tranquil and fearless we shall resign ourselves to God, to conduct us through that ancient and invisible way, which has been sanctified by the feet of all the faithful, and illumined by the passage of the Man of griefs.

The following Address, engrossed and bound as a volume, with the autograph signatures attached, was presented to Miss COBBE on her birthday, at Clifton, where she is spending the winter.

To Frances Power Cobbe.

DECEMBER 4TH, 1902.

On this, your eightieth birthday, we, who recognise the strenuous philanthropic activity and the high moral purpose of your long life, wish to offer you this congratulatory address as an expression of sincere regard.

You were among the first publicly to urge the right of women to University degrees, and your powerful pen has done much to advance that movement towards equality of treatment for them, in educational and other matters, which is one of the distinguishing marks of our time.

In social amelioration, such as ragged schools and workhouse reform, you did the work of a pioneer. By your lucid and thoughtful works on religion and ethics you have contributed in no small degree to that broader and more humane view which has so greatly influenced modern theology in all creeds and all schools of thought.

But it is your chief distinction that you were practically the first to explore the dark continent of our relations to our dumb fellow-creatures, to let in light on their wrongs, and to base on the firm foundation of the moral law their rights and our duty towards them. They cannot thank you, but we can.

We hope that this expression of our regard and appreciation may bring some contribution of warmth and light in the evening of a well-spent life, and may strengthen your sense of a fellowship that looks beyond the grave.

This Address, which was prepared and actively promoted by Mr. and Mrs. Percy Bunting, the Rev. J. Verschoyle, and other friends, had more than 200 signatures attached. We cannot print all the names here, but among those who signed were the following:—

WOULDST thou bring the world unto God? Then live near to Him thyself. If Divine Life pervade thine own soul, everything that touches thee will receive the electric spark, though thou may'st be unconscious of being charged therewith.—Lydia Maria Child.

CHALMERS OF NEW GUINEA.*

THE story of how the command of Jesus to "make disciples of all the nations" has been carried out forms one of the grandest chapters in the history of human progress. It is a narrative in which we follow the deeds of men at the high-water mark of faith and zeal and endurance. It is not free from eccentricities of method and crude passions and distorted ideals. Far from it. It is stained with terrible and far-reaching mistakes. The morning of early enthusiasm has repeatedly passed into an afternoon lethargy of selfish comfort and bigoted authority; but all this does not diminish, but rather accentuates, the fascinating interest of the story itself. Be it the missionary record of Catholic, Methodist, Anglican, or Quaker, it is equally full of daring and devotion. The command of Jesus may again and again have been grievously misinterpreted, but it has, on the whole, been obeyed, so far as it was understood, with disinterested zeal —with a scorn for earthly comforts—and, to use the missionary watchword, "a passion for souls." From the Apostle Paul onwards these men have been the King's messengers. It is but eighteen months since James Chalmers, one of the greatest and bravest of missionaries, fell a martyr beneath the clubs of the cannibals of New Guinea.

Acquaintance with the robust spirit of his life can hardly fail to stimulate anyone in the pursuit of his duty, however unlike that of an apostle his vocation may appear to be.

Chalmers came of Highland peasant stock, and was an embodiment of their physical strength, their warmth of heart, and intrepidity. "My father," he says in his autobiography, "was a thorough old Moderate Churchman — a steady auld kirk. Blow high, blow low, rain or snow, sunshine or storm, all were alike, to church he would go, and I had to accompany him." As to the kind of religious instruction the boy received, he was, perhaps, more fortunate than many. True, he was treated both at home and in school with the Shorter Catechism ad nauseam, and he confesses that "the God of the Highlands at that time was a terror," the description of whose tender mercies used to make his flesh creep. But his own minister, Mr. Meikle, taught a God of love—a taint of unorthodoxy—and it was in his class at the Sunday-school, after his teacher had read an account of the Fiji islanders, that Chalmers first conceived the purpose of going out as an evangelist to the heathen. The resolution was soon overlaid, however, and considerations of a more ordinary and boyish type took its place. A maximum of mischief and larking were characteristic of his youth, and it needed the fervour of an Irish revivalist to effect his "conversion." There was no mistaking the change, and the old resolution to carry the Gospel of love to the savages of the Pacific once again and for the rest of his life became his ruling motive. A brief but valuable apprenticeship of a few months spent in the slums of Glasgow introduced him to the needs of men and women who, we may well believe, were "hardly less degraded, and even more difficult to influence for good than the heathen of New Guinea."

Chalmers went up to college, at Cheshunt, with the promise of a good missionary in him. With no love of books, but active, lithe and strong—a fine skater and swimmer (he had more than once saved the life of a comrade from drowning) and a hard football player—brimming over with human nature and of a decidedly practical turn. The man born to be a pioneer and a leader of men. A few years later, having been accepted by the London Missionary Society, Chalmers, with his newly-married wife—a woman in all except, perhaps, physical respects qualified to be his companion in work and adventure—sailed for Raratonga in the John Williams at the beginning of 1866. The voyage, which lasted seven months, was a characteristic introduction to the years ahead, for meeting the gale in which the London was lost, the ship was driven into Weymouth badly damaged. Before reaching their destination they were wrecked twice, losing everything but their lives, and when at last they landed on the surf-beaten coast of Raratonga, it was from the deck of the notorious pirate Bully Hayes, who had been good enough to give them a passage from Samoa, where they were stranded. Their life on this beautiful island occupied ten years.

The varied labours of the missionary in Raratonga in those days included the management of a native college, where there were forty students and their wives, who were receiving instruction as teachers or evangelists, and a school for some fifty boys. Temperance reform was also imperative. The inhabitants of this Paradise of the Pacific were terribly corrupted by drink, which consisted not only of foreign spirits, but also of the orange beer of their own brewing. To combat this vice, which had demoralised the king as well as his people, called for incessant effort. The laws passed by the chiefs penalising the drinking habits of the people had little effect, as they were themselves addicted to it; but it speaks well for the probity and courage of the native judges when we read that "on Monday our king, the chief judge [and] his son, were all tried, fined, and admonished faithfully by the judges." The chief judge was degraded. Finally, Chalmers found a way to intervene effectively. There was a volunteer corps which met to drill and drink. He threw himself into this movement, encouraged volunteering, won the confidence of the men, and gradually succeeded in proving to them the incompatibility of drink and drill. The men were induced to till their lands and attend classes. A monthly newspaper was circulated, conveying a variety of information. Presently these young rowdies were found regular at meeting, and when the church was in need of repairs it was they who cut the blocks of coral for the masonry. Human nature is the same under a black skin as under a white. The great proof of reform was to be found in the homes of the people, which the missionary and his wife visited systematically, and which soon became cleaner and better furnished, while the foreign trade included less rum and gin, and more useful Manchester and Sheffield goods. Teaching Christianity to black people does not begin and end in throwing over them a veneer of pietism as thin and as artificial as the cotton they wear. It is practical, but it is also spiritual. We may recall Darwin's testimony in his "Voyage of the Beagle" to the genuineness of the religious life of the Polynesian Christians.

Before we laid ourselves down to sleep, the elder Tahitian fell on his knees, and with closed eyes repeated a long prayer in his native tongue. He prayed as a Christian should do, with fitting reverence and without the fear of ridicule or any ostentation of piety. At our meals neither of the men would taste food without saying beforehand a short grace. Those travellers who think that a Tahitian prays only when the eyes of the missionary are fixed on him, should have slept with us that night on the mountain-side.

But, for all the good he was doing, "Tamate," as Chalmers was always known among the natives, chafed for a scene of labour which involved greater risks and demanded more daring. Raratonga was getting too civilised. In 1877 he had the satisfaction of sailing for New Guinea.

New Guinea is the largest island in the world, but its people, who are of several different races, are in the stone age still. Dr. Lawes, in his description of the people, after referring to their hideous cannibalism and other vices, makes these pleasanter observations :—

Woman is not so degraded and downtrodden as in many parts of the heathen world. They are certainly the burden-carriers of the community; but that does not imply the degradation which it would do with us, and they resent any interference on the part of the men with the fetching of water and carrying of wood as an infringement of their women's rights. Domestic affection exists to a degree which surprised us. Parents caring for the children, long after they have grown up to maturity, with great affection and tenderness, and what was more remarkable, the children caring for the parents and watching over them when they had become infirm or sick. We were glad to miss the vice of drunkenness, for no man, as far as we know the country, drinks anything stronger than water. There is a wonderful absence, too, of open immorality. The natives are industrious. They cultivate the soil with great care, and I have seen there what I have never seen before out of civilised life, flowers cultivated in their gardens, and this alone speaks hopefully for their future development.

It was for the elevation of these people that Chalmers and Lawes laboured, assisted by native teachers from Raratonga and Samoa. The field of work extended over some 500 miles of the coast-line of that south-east part of the island which was presently annexed by Great Britain. The aim was to plant mission stations, worked by native teachers and their wives, at intervals all along this coast. These spots soon became centres of peace and moral illumination.

The idea that the missionary to the heathen stands in a boat, clerically attired, and from a safe distance preaches a sermon to his attentive audience on the golden strand is scarcely confirmed by the life of the Apostle of New Guinea. A Government officer relates that on the occasion of a visit to Chalmers he took the opportunity when his host was out of the house to inspect his wardrobe, but could discover neither black coat nor white tie. Had he further examined his stock-in-trade he must have found it far from ecclesiastical —consisting, indeed, of hoop-iron, cloth, beads, knives, tomahawks, and, above all, tobacco. Exception was taken in the Press to such means for the introduction of the Gospel; but, as a matter of fact, tobacco is the principal currency of the land—a little goes a long way—and only through it and the other articles could any bargain be struck or work be paid for. The secret of Chalmers' success was that he entered the settlements as a friend among friends—bold as a lion, tender as a woman, and never at a loss to meet the native on his own ground. He tells how in landing at a new place he always presented pieces of Turkey-red calico to the old women, and if they accepted the compliment he felt perfectly safe. Though the men gathered round with spears and clubs, the women formed a bodyguard and ordered them away, and they obeyed. Woman's influence leavens the manners even of savages. Safety, however, was not always so easily purchased. Once and again the big Scotchman had to wrest spear or club from the hand of a native who, in another moment, would have felled him; or, with the magic of unarmed courage, dispersed a crowd of angry savages—by his commanding voice or his hearty laugh.

And the result. But four years after landing he writes of the place he had made his headquarters for the time:

> For over two years there have been no cannibal ovens, no feasts, no human flesh, no desire for skulls. Tribes that could not formerly meet except to fight now met as friends, and sat side by side in the same house, worshipping the true God.

Chalmers and his comrades were not the men to be beguiled by the appearance of a mushroom Christianity. But they had faith in the ultimate result of their labours. "Even then," said he, "I thought it was worth all the toil and cost, since, in time, these evils would all yield to the Gospel. God is love, seen in Christ; this was the life-word we brought them. Day after day, in duty's routine, not in hymn-singing, praying, or preaching in public, as some imagine that missionaries spend their days, the work was ever going on. The Gospel was working its way in bush-clearing, fencing, planting, house-building, and many other forms of work; through fun, play, feasting, travelling, joking, laughing, and along the everyday experiences of everyday life." Surely there is a word here for us all as to what real religion is—a new spirit of life entering into all departments of life—not merely a new belief, or a new set of rules, or new ceremonies or sacraments.

Everything was turned to account in winning the savage heart; learning the language was a source of great interest. The natives appreciate fun; so Tamate would gather a number round him, and as he attempted to repeat their words they would roar with laughter at his mistakes. It was a mutual heart-warming as well as a lesson in language.

How confidence may be won by confidence given was nobly illustrated in the early days of the life in New Guinea. Chalmers had to leave on one of his frequent voyages to explore and direct. He was away for six weeks, and it was decided that his wife should remain to take charge of the Raratongan teachers they had brought with them. So the brave woman, with not a single white friend, entrusted herself to the safe-keeping of 3,000 cannibals, who, a day or two after, were saying among themselves, "They trust us; we must treat them kindly. They cannot mean us harm, or Tamate would not have left his wife behind." The natives proved, indeed, kinder than the climate to which Chalmers' first and second wife both fell victims.

When, by-and-by, the religious teaching had made some headway, the natives began to speak at meetings, and even to pray in public. Their addresses, judging from samples given, were adorned with the grace of brevity. This was one: "Friends, if we do evil, Jesus weeps—is pained; if we do well, Jesus is well pleased. I have finished." Here again is a native prayer: "Lord Jesus, I am dark; we all are very dark. We want light; give us light, and save us." The notion which the New Guinea Christian conceives of heaven is a pretty one, for prayer was made by one of them that after a good and active life here for Christ they might go to "the place of laughter."

"After a good day's work, and there has been a good supper, often the natives sit in the street or on a platform, and shouts of laughter—screaming laughter—may be heard, as story after story is told of the day's doings and sayings. All are happy and thoroughly enjoying themselves—hence the simile."

The beginnings of religious custom were simple indeed. At one place a large number of natives would assemble and attend the services which Chalmers or his native evangelist conducted. Then, returning to their own homes, they would try to repeat the function; but, ignorant of prayer or hymn, "the service morning and evening amounted to no more than striking for some time a piece of angle-iron, not a word being spoken, for they knew not how."

Courting danger as the salt of life, Chalmers pushed his stations further and further east, until he reached the mouth of the Great Fly River. It was his cherished ambition to explore this great waterway, and to civilise the tribes on its banks; but it was here that, at the hands of a fierce and treacherous tribe among whom the charm of his name had not yet spread, and in company with a young fellow-missionary and a party of native teachers, he fell at the post of duty.

He was a great missionary. A man who exercised a personal influence over those dusky savages which in other ages would have been styled miraculous. Admirably equipped for his work with a large and powerful frame, he never seemed to know fatigue by land or sea. Of strong, practical mind, perfectly fearless, and of a genial loving disposition which won the hearts of all who knew him. "Restless as a volcano," says a friend, "and as subject to eruptions," but when he gave way to a violent outburst, his South Sea Islanders would say "It's Tamate's way," for they knew his generous nature. His human sympathy disarmed fear and opposition.

Such was James Chalmers, a man who for many years rendered good service to the British Government through his knowledge of New Guinea and its people, and as an explorer, peacemaker, and civiliser among the fiercest and most treacherous tribes on the face of the earth, deserves the lasting gratitude of mankind. He was essentially a pioneer. The slow, quiet work of social and intellectual development remained for the most part for others to superintend. With inimitable courage and resourcefulness he went single-handed to open the way. But daring and sagacity were both subservient in him to a higher force—that of love for humanity. In the eye of the cannibal he saw the spirit of a child of God, and to break the bonds of these benighted children and set them free he joyfully spent his life, and was willing at any moment to give it up. And so he won the love of men. "Great-Heart of New Guinea," his friend R. L. Stevenson happily called him. And when he had fallen, Ruatoka, one of the faithful Raratongan teachers, wrote a letter in which he made the following request of the missionary in charge:—

> Hear my wish. It is a great wish. The remainder of my strength I would spend in the place where Tamate and Mr. Tomkins were killed. In that village I would live. In that place where they killed men, Jesus Christ's name and his word I would teach to the people, that they may become Jesus' children. My wish is just this. You know it. I have spoken.

Such a request speaks for itself of the kind of influence Chalmers exercised.

It remains only to add that in the "life" before us Mr. Richard Lovett has paid a fine tribute to a man whose name is worthy of being associated with those of his great fellow-countrymen Livingstone and Moffatt as an Apostle to the Gentiles.

H. M. LIVENS.

AMONG the various side-issues which have been opened by the discussion of the Dean of Ripon's heresy, an especially interesting question was raised by a recent correspondent of the Guardian. What, he asks, are or ought to be the limits of toleration in the Church of England? "In every religious body there must be some limit to toleration, otherwise its existence is reduced to an absurdity. . . . There is a real danger, if her limits are stretched too far, of a disruption of the Church." The sequence of thought in the last sentence is a little difficult to follow. How can inclusiveness lead to disruption? An authoritative pronouncement that certain doctrines were illegal in the Church would lead, no doubt, to a secession on the part of those that hold them; but the tacit allowance of such doctrines is rather a means of preserving than of destroying outward unity. The writer has probably been misled by his metaphor, which seems to be that of a bladder, whose capability of inflation extends only to a certain limit, at which the bladder bursts. It might be a salutary thing to challenge, and stir up among Churchmen, a debate upon the initial assumption expressed above. In the established polity of the Church of England, no doubt, it is pre-supposed that "there must be some limit to toleration"; but the progress of events is revealing more and more clearly the difficulty and danger of attempting to apply this principle. We, at least, know that as a general principle it is not true. We know of one religious body whose reverence for truth is of such a quality as to forbid the definition of any limit to toleration; and of these two safeguards against disruption, the one, "some limit to toleration," the other, reverence for truth, our experience has taught us to put our whole trust and confidence in the second, and utterly to abjure the first.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

SOUTH WALES.

IN the year 1555 Bishop Ferrar was put to death—sent to heaven in a chariot of fire, as friend Blatchford would put it—for teaching that a little child might get to heaven even though it be unbaptised; and on Thursday, Oct. 30, 1902, near the spot where the old bishop was tied to a stake and sent on his onward journey, the friends of free thought placed a memorial tablet "of artistic design," with the following inscription:—

"The noble army of martyrs praise Thee."

"Near this spot suffered for the truth, Saturday, March 30, 1555, Dr. Robert Ferrar, Bishop of St. David's."

"We shall by God's grace light such a candle in England as shall never be put out."

"Erected by a Protestant of this Town."

On parallel lines on each side is the quotation:—

"Be thou faithful unto death and I will give thee a crown of life."

The good bishop (Dr. John Owen) who occupies the seat of St. David's at present was asked to perform the ceremony of unveiling the tablet, but he courteously and naturally refused. Of course he could not do so consistently with his ordination vows; for had he complied he would have condoned thereby the heresies of old Bishop Ferrar. It was in every way more reasonable that the Mayor (Alderman E. Colby Evans) should do so, and thus relieve the bishop of an unpleasant duty. For it should not be forgotten that it is to this day a heresy according to the teaching of the State Church to say that an unbaptised child can possibly be admitted to heaven. It matters not so much who discharges the sacred function, but discharged it must be before the child can be rid of its hereditary guilt. Without the drops of water it cannot be "made a member of Christ, a child of God, and the inheritor of the kingdom of heaven." With its guilt unremoved the poor thing is hopelessly lost, and neither the bishop nor any of the clergy can utter a word of comfort to the sorrowing relatives.

It was only a few weeks ago the curate of Neath (the Rev. W. E. Jenkins) refused to officiate at the funeral of an unbaptised child of six months—the third instance within a short period. He was very sorry, but his instructions were explicit — the words of the Rubric prescribe: "It is to be noted that the office ensuing is not to be used for any that die unbaptised, or excommunicate, or lay violent hands on themselves." How could he bury a child "in sure and certain hope," when he knew the said child, conceived and born in sin, was unbaptised and unregenerate and therefore deserving God's wrath and damnation? Of course this may seem cruel and but cold comfort; but every Nonconformist ought to know that this is the teaching of the Church as by law established.

Some thirty years ago, more or less, the writer of these notes was returning from the annual meetings of the Welsh Unitarian Association, via Lampeter. It was degree day at the College, and the train was crowded with clergy returning from the ceremony. It was his lot to get into a compartment already nearly full, himself making an heretical tenth. Among so many orthodox teachers he deemed it prudent to use his ears rather than his tongue. Naturally enough the question of books became the topic of conversation, and he was interested, but much surprised, when he found that the one question about the book was not, was it good, was it true or helpful or instructive—but was it safe! And this, be it remembered, from gentlemen of education, of mature age, ranging from thirty to sixty-five.

None are so blind as those who will not see,
And none so deaf as those who will not hear.

Those who have read "The Life of Dr. Rowland Williams" may not wonder at this. There we learn (Vol. II., p. 185 note) that the College authorities of that day were very careful that the students' spiritual larder should contain nothing likely to offend the most delicate orthodox palate. They were offered a set of Bishop Colenso's works and accepted them; but note this, they forbade the students to use them, and, in fact, placed them on shelves so high that no ladder on the premises could reach them. To-day all this is changed, and the good bishop's heresies are taught nem. con., and without concealment, from the very chair out of which Dr. Rowland Williams was expelled in 1862, thus verifying the old adage—the heterodoxy of one age becomes the orthodoxy of the next. The world moves. Thought moves. No tying to any stake will prevent it. Creeds and confessions which are intended to prevent it must soon or late bring trouble and disaster. Freedom is essential to true progress. The sailors did not make their voyage any more secure by tying down the compass.

The Archbishop of Canterbury's visit to Lampeter has already been dealt with in the columns of THE INQUIRER, so there need be only a passing remark now. Great things had undoubtedly been expected of him. Churchmen were prepared for a grave and weighty pronouncement on some abstruse point of science or theology, or biblical criticism, or perhaps of disestablishment, church policy or the burning question of education; and reporters had come from London, Manchester, and other places to get a "verbatim" report, but all they got was a mild sermon and a column or so of pleasant chat. The old gentleman seemed to take almost a wicked delight in thus upsetting all calculations as to the nature of his utterances. The writer of the premier article in Essays and Reviews was not going to say anything in defence or condemnation of Rowland Williams, his fellow-heretic of 1860. However full the heart may be, it is wonderful how the golden bit will act as a sufficient restraint on public utterance.

But how is it, in the face of instances such as we have given, and a thousand like them, of the baneful fruit of the upas tree, we are told and told again that our special work as Unitarians is done; that our gospel is preached and better preached elsewhere, where the people crowd and where there is none of that odium which is attached to our little Bethels; that we can do nothing better now than seek a decent burial; and, tell it not in Gath, nor yet in Askelon, some of our own people seem weak enough to believe all this. But one swallow does not spell spring, however it may betoken its approach. No honest, truth-seeking, truth-loving Unitarian can sit patiently Sunday after Sunday and join in the prayers, sing the hymns, and listen to the sermons in the ordinary run of orthodox churches (at any rate in Wales) and feel he is doing the right thing.

In Wales, as elsewhere, despite many an attempt at tightening the bonds, there are many signs of the general break up of the old orthodoxies. The Welsh Press is showing signs of increasing liberality. Emrys ab Iwan's articles on the Higher Criticism in the "Geninen" have surprised many by their very radical character. Even the grave "Traethodydd" has had the courage to throw open its pages to the Rev. Puleston Jones, M.A. (Oxon), the clever blind preacher, to discourse on Martineau's Philosophy, which he does with much power and eloquence. Dr. Witton Davies, known as a contributor to the "Enclyclopædia Biblica"—that repertory of dangerous heresies, has given us a little book on the Old Testament, and Adeney's "How to read the Bible," and Drummond's "Greatest Thing in the World," having been done into Welsh, just show how the wind is expected to blow in Wales—by-and-by.

In the home field the Ymofynydd (Welsh Inquirer), which has been for some time now the property of the S.W.U. Association, has become a living force under the new arrangement. Its articles are brief, but bright and illuminating. The principal features in so far as they differ from the old régime consist in the prominence given to the question of Modern Biblical Criticism. With the third part just issued, the Rev. W. James has concluded his series of Sunday-school lessons on St. Luke. Like his lessons on St. Mark, these may be described as well up to date, and the Sunday scholar who masters them will have a more intelligent appreciation of what the gospel really is than can be got from any other Welsh source.

The outlook of our churches is brighter than it has been for many years. Our pulpits, many of them long vacant, or depending on supplies, are being gradually filled. The church at Pontypridd is still dependent on supplies. Mr. Fisher Short has settled at Aberdare (H. P.), Mr. Kane at Dowlais, and Mr. Jenkins at Llwyn and Bwlch, with every prospect of success. Welsh students are still bulking largely at our colleges, and we are hoping some of these will remember the rock from which they were hewn. Messrs. Simon Jones, Islan Jones, Park Davies, John Evans, and W. S. Jones have taken their degrees. At Cardiff Mr. Tyssul Davies, while making excursions into the nebulous realms of Theosophy during the week, puts his Unitarian Christianity into so attractive a form on Sundays as to draw congregations which crowd the pews and sometimes fill the aisles up to the door. Mr. Tudor Jones is doing good work at Swansea, aiming not so much at making the service an entertainment to tickle the fancy and create a sensation, as to deepen the religious sentiment; he is thus strengthening his congregation. He is well supported by the local Press, which seems ever ready to give good reports of any special work. Professor Carpenter's lectures are creating a deep impression. At Nottage Mr. Phillips, hard pressed by business during the week, maintains all the various activities of his little church at a high level. In this he is ably seconded by Mrs. Phillips, who frequently occupies the pulpit while her husband is doing duty at Wick and Bridgend, both of which pulpits are under his direct supervision. In the Rhondda, with its teeming population, Mr. D. Rees is bravely battling against fearful odds, and, by making good use of lay help, is pushing his outposts in several directions, with some prospect of success. On the Sundays Pentre, Clydach Vale and Tylorstown receive his special attention, while on week-nights he does a good deal of open-air preaching. His churches, like that at Gellionen, are seriously handicapped by a heavy debt.

At Lampeter and Merthyr new buildings are in course of erection, and there our ministers have their hands full; and the rest of us are busy in a quiet way doing what we can to edify and instruct our people. By the very sudden death of our old friend the Rev. D. L. Evans, in his ninetieth year, a figure long familiar has been removed from our midst.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

CHRISTMAS APPEALS.

London: George's-row Mission.—The Rev. F. Summers writes:—"Will you be kind enough to allow me to appeal to the friends of the poor at this season of the year? I am sorry to say that there is just now very considerable distress. I shall be glad to receive donations to the Poor's Purse and the Christmas Fund. Also gifts of new or cast-off clothing, books for gifts or for the library, toys, &c. Parcels may be sent to the Domestic Mission, George's-row, St. Luke's, E.C.; and letters either to the same address, or to 4, Durley-road, Stamford-hill, London, N."

Manchester Domestic Mission: Willert-street.—The Rev. J. W. Bishop writes:—"We earnestly appeal to friends this year, for our needs are great. We have now 500 scholars in the school, and in consequence of epidemic and shortness of work, a great deal of poverty in the district; also the extra help asked for is the more necessary because several who have liberally helped in the past have died during the year. But we still hope to be able to dispense the usual amount of joy to the children, and give as much cheer to the aged and poor as in former years. We ask your kind assistance by sending money, parcels of clothing, or toys, which will be thankfully received by the Rev. J. W. Bishop, at the Mission House, Willert-street, Collyhurst, Manchester."

Aberdare: Highland-place.—A very successful series of Sunday evening lectures has been organised by the Rev. H. Fisher Short. The first was given on Nov. 9; the subject being "A Brief Sketch of the History of Unitarianism." This has been followed by "What Unitarians Believe about God," "What Unitarians Believe about Man," and there are four lectures to follow. The four already delivered have attracted large congregations, and have created considerable local interest.

Accrington.—A Sale of Work for the purpose of raising funds to clear off a deficit on the church accounts and effect necessary repairs to the building was held on Thursday and Saturday, Nov. 27 and 29. Lieut.-Colonel Turner, of Chadwell, near Clitheroe, opened the sale with a breezy and encouraging speech on the Thursday, in which he referred to his connection as a lay-student in the old days with Manchester New College, from which he graduated in the London University. On the Saturday the sale was reopened by Mrs. W. Noble, of Bolton, a former member of the Accrington congregation. The chair on this occasion was taken by Mrs. James Briggs; and a vote of thanks to the opener was moved by Mrs. Grime and seconded by Mrs. Ernest Ingham. The ladies of the Sewing Society have worked steadily in preparation for the sale, and are to be congratulated on the result (some £60), which exceeded anticipations. The Rev. W. H. Burgess has arranged a course of special sermons, now in progress, on "Modern Aspects of Religious Faith," in which the Revs. Jenkyn Thomas and Robert McGee are taking part.

Birmingham: Balsall Heath.—The third annual congregational meeting of Our Father's Church, held in the Tindal-street Board Schools on Wednesday, Nov. 19, was well attended, the Rev. C. J. Sneath in the chair. The secretary's report and balance sheet were read and adopted. The latter showed that during the financial year ending Sept. 28, £164 was raised entirely by the congregation, being an improvement on the previous year. The congregation are labouring under the disadvantage of having to pay £50 a year for the use of the Moseley and Balsall Heath Institute, in which their services are held, and other expenses being considerable, they have only been able to allot a very small and entirely inadequate sum to their minister's salary. The committee hope, however, to do better next year. The average attendance at the services has been a little under 100, but at the Harvest Thanksgiving services the number was quite 350. In addition there are eighty children in the Sunday-school. It was decided to hold the congregational soirée on Dec. 30, at which it is hoped to see a large attendance of friends from the other Unitarian churches in Birmingham.

Bootle.—Special Sunday evening services have been held during November. On Nov. 9 the Rev. E. W. Lummis, M.A., spoke on "A Unitarian's Thought of God"; Nov. 16, the Rev. C. J. Street, M.A., LL.B., discoursed on "A Unitarian's Belief about Jesus"; Nov. 23, the Rev. A. E. Parry set forth "The Real Worth of the Bible"; and on Nov. 30, the Rev. Dr. Klein lectured on "Unitarianism and Christianity." At each service every available seat has been occupied, and the greatest interest has been displayed in the lectures by the large number of strangers present.

Chester.—The 202nd anniversary of Matthew Henry's Chapel, the oldest Nonconformist place of worship in Chester, took place on Nov. 30. The preacher, the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, delivered two able and appropriate sermons to good congregations. The collections taken in aid of the Restoration Fund amounted to £5. On the previous Friday a successful Rummage Sale was held in the schoolroom, the proceeds from which, £11, were also for the above object.

Chichester.—On Thursday, Nov. 27, the teachers and scholars entertained the parents and friends with an excellent programme, consisting of selected readings, well rendered by some scholars, vocal and instrumental music by the teachers, and other items, all greatly enjoyed.

Devonport.—On Wednesday, Nov. 26, a Sale of Work was held in the Temperance Hall for the purpose of raising about £100 required to complete the fund for the purchase of the freehold. There was a very good attendance, with the result that now only £25 is needed to attain the object in view. On Sunday last, Nov. 30, the church anniversary was celebrated, a special musical service being rendered in the evening. Appropriate sermons were preached by the Rev. G. Leonard Phelps.

Dover.—On Tuesday, Nov. 26, the Guild of Good Fellowship began the winter session with a tea. In the evening Mr. G. B. Richmond, the editor of the East Kent Advertiser, delivered an interesting lecture, pointing out the evils likely to follow the passing of the Education Bill at present before Parliament. An animated discussion followed.

East London Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The second meeting of the session was held at Forest-gate on Saturday, Nov. 29. An excellent paper, entitled "The Bible in the Sunday School," was read by the Rev. W. H. Rose, of Walthamstow. A short conference followed, in which the Rev. H. Woods Perris, Mr. W. J. Noel and others took part. There were sixteen present.

Gateshead.—The third of a series of Sunday evening lantern services was held in Unity Church last Sunday, conducted by the Rev. A. Harvie. The hymns were thrown upon the screen, with portraits of the authors. The readings were from Edward Carpenter's "Towards Democracy," and the lecture described Seton-Thompson's story, "The Trail of the Sandhill Stag." Mr. Thompson is naturalist to the Government of Manitoba, and tells the story of a man who hunted a stag for three years, but who, coming up to, was unable to find heart to kill it. This was illustrated by pictures taken from the book.

Ipswich.—The annual meeting of the congregation was held on Thursday, Nov. 27, Mr. G. J. Notcutt presiding over a fair attendance of subscribers and friends. The reports recorded a year's steady progress in all branches of the church's work, but an adverse balance of over £200 (including deficit on the Bi-centenary Restoration Fund). The treasurer announced, however, that the B. and F.U.A. had generously promised £25 towards the deficiency, and this would greatly encourage the congregation in its efforts to pay off the debt. Miss G. Woolnough presented an interesting report of the work of the Social Guild, and Mr. H. W. Roberts explained the scheme of artistic decoration of the schoolroom upon which the guild is now engaged. The Rev. L. Tavener reported a year's good work in the Sunday-school, and the growth out of it of a meeting for men held every Sunday afternoon in the chapel. The secretary, Mr. S. J. Hutley, having undertaken the duties of superintendent of the Sunday-school, resigned his office, and Mr. F. H. Smith was elected to succeed him. The meeting concluded with a brief address by the minister.

Knutsford.—A Sale of Work on behalf of the Knutsford stall at the forthcoming East Cheshire Christian Union Bazaar, to be held in Manchester, and in aid of a fund for the improvement of the accommodation of the schoolroom, was held on Friday and Saturday, Nov. 28 and 29. It was opened on the Friday by Mr. William Long, J.P., of Warrington, who is a trustee of the chapel, and on Saturday by Mrs. George Holt. Over £60 was taken on the first day, and the total receipts amounted to £116. The expenses will probably be less than £10, so that a satisfactory sum will be available for the purposes mentioned.

London: Peckham.—On Friday, Nov. 28, a meeting under the auspices of the National Unitarian Temperance Association was held in the Avondale Hall, Mr. T. Pallister Young in the chair. The Rev. W. G. Tarrant, in a stirring speech, moved a resolution asking the School Board for London to include definite Temperance teaching in the upper standards of all schools under its control. He thought this an important subject—the knowledge of self—likely to inculcate self-control, self-reverence, as Tennyson called it. The Rev. T. E. M. Edwards seconded, and the Rev. J. H. Wicksteed supported the motion, adding that if our educational machinery could not remove such a crying evil as the drink traffic had become, education was a failure indeed. Messrs. Ritchie, of the Lambeth Band of Hope Union, Bredall, and F. A. Edwards also spoke in favour, and the meeting closed with a resolution, moved by the Rev. G. Carter, thanking the Association and the speakers.

London: Rhyl-street.—At last Monday's entertainment Mr. J. H. Leigh was the principal contributor to the evening's enjoyment, by giving four of his excellent readings. Miss Case's violin pieces and Mr. Thomas Adams's songs were also highly appreciated.

Manchester: Lower Mosley-street.—An attendance of upwards of 100 people marked each of the four Sunday evening services, when the series of addresses dealing with "The Life of James Martineau and its Lessons" was given by the Rev. A. Cobden Smith.

Mottram (Appointment).—The Rev. H. Bodell Smith, of Blackpool, has accepted an invitation to the pulpit, rendered vacant in June by the resignation of the Rev. Noah Green, after a ministry extending over thirty-two years. Mr. Smith enters on his new duties on Christmas Day.

Nottingham.—The High Pavement Historical Society held their second meeting of the season on Thursday evening, Nov. 27, when the Rev. E. I. Fripp, B.A., gave an interesting lecture on "Mediæval Culture," illustrated by the sculptures on Giotto's Bell Tower in Florence. The President (Mr. J. C. Warren) occupied the chair, and there was again a very good attendance.

Poole.—The closing days of November will long be remembered by the members and friends of the Poole congregation as the occasion of the very successful mission for the deepening of the spiritual life conducted by the Rev. Edgar Daplyn. The mission was carried through under the auspices of the Southern Unitarian Association, and was one of the last pieces of work planned by the late Rev. E. S. Anthony, whose ministry left such a marked effect on the Poole congregation. The mission really commenced on Sunday, Nov. 23, but the preparations for it in the way of house to house visiting, extra musical practices, &c., have been in hand for some time. At the outset the programme looked almost over full, but the courage of the missioner and his workers on the spot was fully justified by the results. Out of seventeen meetings planned, sixteen were really well attended, and the weather was accountable more than anything else for the only meeting that was at all poor. The whole effect of the services was helpful and inspiriting to all who took part, and of every meeting it may be said with truth that "it was good to be there." Two afternoon meetings for women were conducted by Mrs. William Carter, who also acted as president of the local mission committee, and the social meeting held on Wednesday was rendered all the more sociable by the kindly presence of the Rev. William Blazeby (formerly of Rotherham), Mr.

J. Cogan Conway (President of the Southern Unitarian Association), and other friends, while on the same evening the congregation was swelled by a goodly contingent of friends from Bournemouth. On Sunday afternoon (being Temperance Sunday), a temperance "rally" was held, when very welcome aid was rendered by Miss Spencer and Mr. W. T. Bushrod, of Southampton. Through the kindness of Messrs. Bayley and Sons, the school was transformed during the week into a very comfortable tea-room, which was much appreciated as a general meeting-place, and for the facilities it afforded for friendly converse. The mission was brought to a close on Sunday evening last by an open Communion service, which was well attended, and which seemed to fitly gather up and express the spirit of thanksgiving felt by all who had been privileged to take part, in however lowly a fashion, in the work and worship of the preceding week.

Preston.—On Monday week last Mr. John Harwood, of Manchester, gave his rendering of Dickens's "Cricket on the Hearth" in the Percy-street schoolroom, before a delighted and enthusiastic audience. The recital was in three "Chirps," corresponding to the divisions of the story as written, and occupied two hours in delivery. The "Cricket on the Hearth" is a comparatively recent addition to Mr. Harwood's répertoire, and is likely to prove a great favourite.

Reading.—The services at the Unitarian Church on Sunday last were conducted by Miss Györy, of Budapest, and Mr. W. H. Shrubsole, F.G.S. It was cheering to observe that the congregations were much larger than usual. On Monday Miss Györy lectured to a very appreciative audience on "Parallelisms in the History of Britain and Hungary." At the close it was announced that after speaking in the Town Hall at Northampton on Saturday next, the talented lecturer would not be able to undertake any more public engagements before returning to Hungary, and the hope was expressed that she will be able to revisit us next year to renew and extend her acquaintance with our congregations.

Rotherham.—A lecture was given on Wednesday week by the Rev. A. Dolphin on "Sartor Resartus," to the Church of our Father Literary and Social Union, and was much appreciated.

South Shields.—The congregation has suffered another loss, through the death of Mr. W. Carr, of one of its earliest and staunchest adherents. His heart was in the welfare of the church, and for over thirty years his interest was constant in all that concerned the progress of liberal religion. At the funeral last Sunday the first part of the service was held in the church. In the evening Mr. Thomas Paxton preached on "The Immortality of Influence."

Trowbridge.—On Sunday last Mr. T. A. Williams, of Bristol, occupied the pulpit of the Conigre Chapel. Mr. Williams is the able lecturer of the West of England Anti-Vivisection Society, and upon this occasion, at the request of the Rev. J. Wain, delivered an excellent sermon in the evening on "Religion and its Bearing on the Treatment of Dumb Animals." The morning sermon was on "The Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of Man." In the afternoon Mr. Williams addressed the Sunday scholars on the importance of being members of and holding on into manhood and womanhood the pledge of the Band of Hope.

Tylorstown: South Wales.—The Mission services have been held on alternate Sundays in the afternoon, at the Assembly Hall, Queen's Hotel, during the last three years, the attendance numbering about twenty-six. The platform has been occupied by the Rev. D. Rees, Pentre, assisted by ministers and laymen. On Thursday evening, Nov. 27, a social tea was held, when about sixty persons of all ages sat at the tables. After the tea a meeting was held, under the presidency of Mr. Joseph Jenkins, Ferndale, to present Mr. and Mrs. Griffiths with a dressing-case and silver fruit stand respectively, with suitable inscriptions, as simple tokens of indebtedness to them for their generosity in granting the use of the Assembly Hall for services during the last three years, free of any charge whatsoever. Various addresses were delivered suitable to the occasion, and Mr. and Mrs. Griffiths responded. Friends from the Pentre and Clydach Vale Churches were present.

TEMPERANCE Sunday was observed in a large number of our churches and missions and Sunday-schools on Sunday last, special sermons being preached and in most cases special offertories in aid of temperance work being taken. In many cases the National Unitarian Temperance Association was able to arrange exchanges of pulpits to some advantage. Encouraging accounts have reached us of the gatherings, which are indicative of the growing interest our churches take in the temperance cause.

WE noted a fortnight ago the substantial volume issued by our Hungarian brethren, containing their translations of most of the addresses and papers of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers of 1901. We are glad now to welcome also a translation into Italian by Signor Bracciforti, of Milan, of the three addresses by the President (Mr. Carpenter), Dr. Drummond, and Mr. Armstrong.

"Flower-o'-the-Corn is Mr. Crockett's Apotheosis," say some of the Reviewers;

"Flower-o'-the-Corn must be placed high among Mr. Crockett's Second Best," say Others.

The consensus of opinion of the critics may be summed up in the closing words of the able reviews in The Glasgow Herald and Lloyd's Weekly Newspaper:—

"Mr. Crockett has never introduced his readers to anything so impressive and effective as the Camisard insurrection, the wild heights of the Cevennes, and the rugged virtues of the psalm-singers of the South. . . . Wellwood and Raith are both finely-drawn figures, and Flower-o-the-Corn and Yvette, the Eve and Lilith of the tale, are as striking portraits of womanhood as may be found in fiction."—GLASGOW HERALD.

"We have had many good books from Mr. Crockett's pen, but certainly none better than the present one. There is much intrigue, plot, and counter-plot before the gallant captain and 'Flower-o'-the-Corn' find peace and happiness together. It is a fine story, and one that will enhance Mr. Crockett's reputation."—LLOYD'S.

SELECTIONS FROM
THE OCCASIONAL SERMONS AND ADDRESSES OF

JOHN HAMILTON THOM.

EDITED WITH A MEMOIR BY

V. D. DAVIS, B.A.

Crown 8vo, 224 pp. A Companion Volume to "Christ the Revealer."

"A brief and well-written biography is followed by extracts from sermons and addresses, three complete discourses, and an address to students. The book appeals naturally, in the first place, to those who share Mr. Thom's conceptions of a liberal, undogmatic Christianity, but there is much to interest any serious thinker."—MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.

"Selections, pertinent and illuminating, from the sermons and addresses of Mr. Thom, the broad-minded Unitarian minister, and friend of Dr. Martineau. Mr. Davis's memoir is a good example of description and selection in a small space."—BOOKMAN.

"The book will be made most welcome by those who know the two volumes of 'Laws of Life after the Mind of Christ,' and it may do more than even those volumes to keep this good man's influence alive."—EXPOSITORY TIMES.

"There is much helpful thought in these selections, presented with clearness and force, and calculated to be of value to earnest minds and of especial use to those who are engaged in public ministry. There is a directness in J. H. Thom's treatment of his subjects, both as regards the duties of the ministry and the congregation, which is at once suggestive and inspiring, and which must appeal to men of sincere purpose, whether their views be considered orthodox or heterodox."—BRITISH FRIEND.

Yorkshire Training School of Physical Culture.

The above School was opened more than two years ago with the object of providing a centre in the North of England for the professional training of educated women in the Swedish system of Physical Culture.

The minimum cost is of two years' duration, and includes the Study of Physiology, Anatomy, Hygiene, Chemistry, Elementary Pathology, Theory of Movements, Practical Subjects, as Gymnastics, Fencing, Swimming, Games, &c.

That such a centre is needed seems to be proved by the fact that the first student trained by this School was, on the completion of her course, appointed under the Bradford Board as Instructress on Physical Culture to their schools.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

A STATEMENT as to the case of Mr. Gottfried Schwarz, of Heidelberg, with an appeal for contributions towards a Defence Fund, will be found in another column.

NEXT week's INQUIRER, published on Dec. 20, will be our Christmas Number. In the following week, while the paper will be dated in the usual course, Dec. 27, it will be necessary to print early in the week. Editorial and other matter should reach the office by Tuesday morning, at latest. Calendar Notices for Christmas Day should appear next week.

WE deeply deplore the fate which has overtaken the Unitarian Church at Sydney. Some time ago, in spite of warnings received from several quarters, a man giving the name of Arthur Bentley Worthington was appointed minister on account of his attractive manners and brilliant powers as a preacher. His career of villainy has been revealed in the Criminal Court at Melbourne, and he has been sentenced to seven years' imprisonment with hard labour. It ought to be mentioned, as showing the care with which the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association try to discharge their duties, that the congregation at Sydney were informed that if Mr. Worthington was appointed and retained as minister, a promised grant in aid of the salary of a suitable minister would most certainly not be paid. The story of this man's career is so loathsome that it had better remain with him in the ignominy and solitude of his prison cell.

THE Education Bill was received in the House of Lords late on Wednesday night last week. Since then it has been pushed rapidly through the preliminary stages, and at the time of writing is under consideration in Committee. The Upper House has entirely justified Lord Rosebery's warning to the Nonconformist deputation which he received on Monday—namely, not to expect from the Lords any ameliorative changes in the Bill. Some good speeches have been made, notably that by Dr. Perceval, Bishop of Hereford, who, in addition to deploring the neglect of Nonconformist interests and the inevitable warfare which he foresees throughout the community, took the line which all earnest friends of education have taken, and lamented the feeble and selfish temper in which the Bill had been framed. What the country wanted was a whole-hearted attempt to perfect the system of national education; but here is nothing but "a niggardly, parsimonious provision" for secondary education, and, for the rest, the Bill is merely a piece of "opportunist political patchwork." He declared that the opposition to the Bill was not, as was alleged, merely a Nonconformist opposition. "The truth is," he said, "that most educational authorities are against the Bill. Take the troops of men teaching your sons in the great public schools, consult the finest minds in the great universities, and they will all pronounce against the Bill."

INSTEAD of conceding anything to the opponents of the Bill, the first amendment of importance made by the Lords is an alteration of the clause embodying the "Cowper-Temple" principle which was originally put into Part II. of the Bill, dealing with colleges and other institutions for secondary education. The effect is to render these institutions, provided as they will be by the educational authorities, liable to become denominational centres. An amendment by the Bishop of Hereford to make continuation-school attendance compulsory till the age of seventeen was rejected on Tuesday, as well as one to give the public four managers instead of two on the local boards. The famous Kenyon-Slaney amendment, which, as we noticed at the time, was left confessedly ambiguous by Mr. Balfour at the last discussion on the subject in the Commons, came up for debate on Wednesday night, with the result that more extreme amendments from the clerical side having been rejected, it was passed in the following form :—

> Religious instruction given in a public elementary school not provided by the local authority shall, as regards its character, be in accordance with the provisions of the trust deed (if any) relating thereto, and shall be under the control of the managers. Nothing in this clause shall affect any provision in a trust deed for reference to the Bishop or other superior denominational authority so far as such provision gives to the Bishop or authority the power of deciding whether the character of the religious instruction is or is not in accordance with the provisions of the trust deed.

ON Thursday week Mr. Stopford Brooke gave the last of his autumn course of lectures at University College, devoting it, as in the previous week, to William Blake. Having recommended a book by Professor Phelps, of Yale, on Romanticism in the Eighteenth Century to readers of Blake, Mr. Brooke spoke of his great love of animals, expressed in the well-known couplet :—

> A robin red-breast in a cage
> Sets all heaven in a rage.

Joy, Mr. Brooke said, was the chief element of Blake's life. When he saw evil in the world, it did not make him melancholy, like the early romantics, but furious. His religion of mysticism was then described. His doctrines, taken up by selfish men, had been made the ground of some of the greatest villanies that have defiled the world, but Blake himself was guarded from all wrong by his childlikeness and the crowd of angels that filled his soul.

> Love seeketh not itself to please
> Nor for itself hath any care
> But for another gives its ease,
> Builds a heaven in hell's despair.

In his work as a painter and engraver the same qualities appear. On the whole question of his design and execution, Mr. Brooke said there was no better guide than Rossetti's chapter in Gilchrist's Life of Blake.

MR. STOPFORD BROOKE'S second course of five lectures at University College will begin on Thursday evening, Jan. 29, on the same general subject, "The Rise of Naturalism or the Romantic Movement in Poetry in the Eighteenth Century." The poetry of Cowper, Crabbe and Burns will first be dealt with, but he should get through these as quickly as possible, Mr. Brooke said on Thursday week, so as to have more time for Wordsworth. Annual subscribers will receive their tickets for this second course. Other applications for tickets (5s. for the course, teachers 2s. 6d.) should be made to the hon. secretary, Stopford Brooke Lectures, University College, W.C., on or after New Year's Day.

ON Wednesday evening Mr. Vladimir Tchertkoff gave a lantern lecture at Essex Hall, on "Social Evils of the Present Day," illustrating with a large number of pictures Russian life in its religious, political, economical and social aspects. Scenes from the life of the poverty-stricken and oppressed peasantry, and from the brutalities of prison life were brought into sharp contrast with the life of the Court, the Church, and the upper ranks of society, with outspoken comments from the lecturer's uncompromising point of view, which denounces not only war, but all use of force by the law, the present economic order, and even the use of money. As the only remedy for all these evils, Mr. Tchertkoff pleaded simply for the spirit of brotherly love and personal fidelity to that ideal. He told of the Doukhobors, of what they had suffered for their fidelity, and one most touching passage of the lecture was when a series of pictures was thrown without comment upon the screen, to the accompaniment of some Russian sacred music, beautifully rendered on the piano, and one saw the passage of the Doukhobors from Russia to Canada, and their settlement in that new country. Mr. Tchertkoff then showed some scenes from Tolstoy's life, with one very beautiful portrait of the old man, taken during his recent illness, the noble head resting on his pillow, and the deep-set eyes looking straight into those of the audience; and finally two scenes from the Last Supper, and Jesus with his disciples, going out into the night, as representing in that supreme life the spirit in which all sufferings are to be borne. One could not but be deeply impressed by the perfect sincerity and the noble spirit of Mr. Tchertkoff's address, but at the same time would plead that there is beneficent as well as oppressive force in the world, that the Church as we know it in this country is not merely the blind upholder of iniquity, and that law and regulation must have a place even in the perfect brotherhood of man.

THE Bishop of Worcester delivered last week, in St. Philip's Church, Birmingham, a series of three mid-day addresses on "The Historical Trustworthiness of the Gospels." We have before us a report of the first of these lectures. It is not in itself remarkable, but derives a certain interest from the fact that it was delivered by the leader of the younger High Church party. Dr. Gore repudiates the view that the Gospels can be guaranteed by the Church.

> This is, I am persuaded (he says), a sheer delusion. . . . The authority of the Church rests upon, and purely upon, the witness and authority of the Apostles. The Church has always supposed that the authority of the Apostles is represented in the Gospels, that this represents simply their witness, their preaching; while if criticism can show that it does not—if it shows not what the Apostles bore witness to, but a much later accretion upon that—they have upset the authority of the Apostles and the authority of the Church resting upon them.

Although the phrasing of this passage seems to shift the burden of proof from the dogmatist, on whom it really rests, to the critic, it is nevertheless a striking concession from an Anglican apologist. In one sense, indeed, it concedes the whole Anglican case. Exclusivism can never be made to rest on science. There must always be a degree of diffidence, and of mutual respect, in the holders of different opinions concerning the probable significance of uncertain data. Dr. Gore has thrown into the arena of criticism the sacramental claims of the Church, as well as her creeds. These are to be vouched for by no lofty profession of peculiar grace, but simply by the superior scholarship and acumen of Anglican critics.

DR. GORE goes on to speak of the dates of the Synoptic records. Without any detailed argument, for which he had no time, he assumes the earliest dates which Harnack considers possible. In the further course of his address he sketches out for his popular audience, and fully accepts, the priority of Mark and the two-document theory of the origin of Matthew and Luke. Taking, then, the time which elapsed between the Crucifixion and the writing of these documents at forty years, the Bishop refers to the researches of M. Sabatier about St. Francis.

> Forty years (he infers) can produce distortions and accretions until the thing becomes something different from what it was at starting. Yet a story may be preserved in perfect fidelity during that period by living memories bridging over the period, preserved, by long training, from distortions and accretions.

The address concludes with a reference to the note of Papias about the origin of Mark's Gospel, and the question of how the trustworthiness of the Synoptics can be tested is reserved for the second lecture. The conclusion at which the Bishop of Worcester will arrive in this course is predetermined by his office. But we cannot help speculating, not without hope, upon the future development of the lecturer. He has already enunciated opinions similar to those for which Dr. Martineau was at one time denounced by Unitarians. He has visibly advanced in his view, both of the Church and of the Bible, in the liberal direction. Already he accepts the critical position. Will he ever come to the perception that the doctrine of an exclusive Church, and the practice of imposing credenda, are alike inconsistent with that position? More wonderful things have happened than that Dr. Gore should be known, thirty years hence, as a stalwart champion of non-subscription and rational religion.

PROFESSOR ESTLIN CARPENTER'S lectures in Manchester were listened to by some few ministers, but the audiences consisted for the most part of the laity of our own congregations, with a small sprinkling from more orthodox churches. It is an unwritten article of faith amongst us that there are no Biblical and theological secrets which an honest laymen may not learn, as there are no mysteries of godliness that a righteous layman may not preach. In this faith it appears we differ from our brethren of the Evangelical churches. In a paper on Higher-Critics and Hyper-Critics Dr. James Moulton, while pleading for a tolerant mind towards cautious and devout criticism, is reported also to have said that "he thought that even the best results of modern criticism were not ready for public consumption, and it would be folly indeed to mention them to the majority of our congregations." Doubtless there are times when critical exposition would be out of place; as there are times and seasons when an exhortation or united prayer would be out of place. But those who pursue a policy of excessive caution will have to consider, whether it is better that the young people growing up in the churches should learn awkward facts about the Holy Scriptures first from Christian teachers, or from those who make light of the authority of Christ, and dislike the Bible? Certain truths are bound eventually to be known. It sometimes makes much difference how and from whom we learn them.

"UNDENOMINATIONALISM: Political and Religious. A Plea for Natural Religion" is the title of the Rev. Charles Hargrove's sermon in this month's Mill Hill Pulpit. The injury done to the cause of education by sectarian strife in this country, ever since the days of the Lollards, is clearly stated. And the plea is that what the State must do in the schools is to provide as an essential part of national education, that the children should be taught to trust in God and keep His commandments.

> "Christianity," writes the great Bishop Butler, "is a republication of Natural Religion. It teaches Natural Religion in its genuine simplicity. It affords the evidence of testimony for the truth of it." If so, then at the school as in the world, with young minds as it was yet with undeveloped man, Natural Religion will but prepare the way for further teaching. But on that further teaching the differences which arise will be broad and impassable. Before we come to that we are generally agreed.
> Why then should we not teach so much and so much only in every public school—"to fear God and keep his commandments"? Why should we not leave it to the denominations to build on this foundation, well laid in the child's mind, whatever fashion of temple they approve? You will say it is impossible. Agnostic and Anglican, Evangelical and Romanist, will make truce for awhile to unite their forces to prevent it. They will agree that God must not be taught as human reason reveals him, but only as the denominations perceive him. Perhaps it would be so.
> Yet is it our duty, as good Christians who believe with Jesus that all the law is fulfilled in the two commandments of love to God and neighbour, to hold up the flag of Natural Religion, the religion of all of us, though few enrol themselves under it. The day may yet come when in every school in England the children will be taught what we have learnt of our fathers, "to put their trust in God and keep his commandments," and when all the Churches will be satisfied to add to this teaching on their own account as to each seems good.

THE December number of Sermons for the Day contains a Harvest Sermon of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong's on "Weather," which quotes the Etterick Shepherd's saying: "Eh, mon, the weather's a graund topic, but toonsfolk know naught aboot it," and tells of a family in which for two generations the young folk were never allowed to say the weather was bad. "The mother and the grandmother both had held such speech an irreverence against him who holds the sunshine and the storm-clouds in his hands, and portions out the heat and the cold, the drought and the rain, each in its season." And, so the preacher adds, "I have still the feel of a sort of fault-finding with God when I hear vehement complaints about the cold or the wet."

> When by "bad" weather we mean simply wet weather, we are far indeed astray, colouring the universe with our own little wants and wishes. Wet weather may be best weather; and even in the town there is to the country-bred a great joy when, after a long spell of drought, the patter of the rain is heard, and the clouds empty themselves upon the land. For they seem to hear the rustle in the grass, the murmur in the woods, the loosening of the clods, the washing of the world from the dust of many days, the rivulets by the hedge-rows, the refreshed and rejuvenescent earth singing its psalm of praise.

In later passages of the sermon there are delightful Nature pictures, of various kinds of weather, and words of wisdom as to the spirit of thankful trust in which we ought to rest, even when we cannot understand the great sweep of the Divine order in the universe.

THE publication of a cheap and abridged edition of John Wesley's diary has awakened new interest in the history of the great man; the opening article of the winter number of the Methodist Recorder will tend to keep that interest wide awake. For it gives yet another version of John Wesley's relations with Grace Murray, with details of her life, her conversion, her (first) husband, Captain Murray, his threat to put her into a madhouse for joining the Methodists, his death, John Wesley's proposal to marry her, and her marriage to another man. It is a curious old story, and must be read and studied in full to be even partly understood, but the document which we take the liberty to quote below gives some indication of a sort of hidden tragedy in Wesley's career. The after history of Wesley gives a touch of irony to its first sentences. It was written to a friend a few days after Grace Murray's marriage to John Bennet:—

Leeds, Oct. 7, 1749.

My dear Brother,—A loving husband is a very amiable character; a fond one, I think, is not so. But if I had a wife I believe I should be the latter, and perhaps you may lean to the same extreme. To you, therefore, I can freely speak my mind, as knowing it will go no further. Since I was eight (?) years old, I never met with such a severe trial as for some days past. For ten years past God has been preparing a fellow-labourer for me, by a wonderful train of providences. Last year I was convinced of it: therefore I delayed not, but as I thought, made all sure beyond a danger of disappointment. But we were soon afterwards torn asunder by a whirlwind. In a few months the storm was over. I then used more precaution than before, and fondly told myself that the day of evil would return no more. But it, too, soon returned. The waves arose again since I came out of London. I fasted and prayed and strove all I could, but the sons of Zeruiah were too hard for me. The whole world fought against me, but above all my own familiar friend. Then was the word fulfilled, "Son of man, behold! I take from thee the desire of thine eyes at a stroke; yet shalt thou not lament, neither shall thy tears run down." The fatal irrecoverable stroke was struck on Thursday last. Yesterday I saw my friend (that was) and him to whom she is sacrificed. I believe you never saw such a scene! But why should a living man complain—a man for the punishment of his sins.—Yours,

J. WESLEY.

A long letter written six months earlier to Wesley by the man to whom Grace Murray was eventually "sacrificed" cannot be quoted here, the curious are referred to the Recorder; but it would indicate some fear, on Mr. Bennet's part also, that the good lady was being sacrificed in a different sense, for it ends: "I desire you will be tender of her character and consider she is a woman."

TRUTH is the strong thing. Let man's life be true.—R. Browning.

LITERATURE.

RECENT FRANCISCAN LITERATURE.*

THE number of books which are coming continually under our notice dealing with St. Francis of Assisi and his movement is a refreshing sign of the vigour of our religious idealism. Many of them, of course, appeal strongly to the scholar and the artist. The latter turns with delight to the emotional springs of the noblest religious art of Italy, while for the former there is no field more suitable in all its conditions for the study of the evolution of an historical portrait, or more fascinating in its unsolved literary problems and the steady growth of evidence of first-rate importance. In Franciscan studies we are still on a voyage of discovery. Professor Little's article in the current number of the "English Historical Review," on the Sources of the History of St. Francis of Assisi, provides an excellent guide to the recent literature, and an impartial statement of the present conflict of testimony and opinion upon many important points, such as the date and authority of the Speculum and the origin of the Legend of the Three Companions. All serious students of the subject will be grateful to him for providing such an admirable survey of the field. The need of it must have occurred to many besides himself. Much may also be hoped from the labours of the Société Internationale d'Etudes Franciscaines, organised by the efforts of M. Paul Sabatier, and inaugurated at Assisi last Whitsuntide. A British branch of this society has been formed quite recently with the object of promoting research, and a series of translations of some of the early texts has been undertaken already. We may add in a parenthesis that M. Sabatier has accepted the office of Hon. President, and the Committee includes Professor Collins of King's College, Canon Rawnsley, Canon Knox Little, the Rev. W. H. Frere, the Rev. W. H. Drummond, Professor Little, Mr. Alfred Nutt, and several other names, with the Hon. and Rev. James Adderley as secretary.

On turning to the three books which we have placed at the foot of this article, we need not linger long over the small volume by Professor Herkless. It is a useful compilation, but presents us with no new facts or fresh points of view. Its most useful section is probably the account of St. Dominic. There is very little about him in English, and there should be room for a biography based upon a critical study of the sources. It would, however, be a difficult task to accomplish. His personality has coalesced far more completely with the later atmosphere of legend than is the case with St. Francis. Probably in the end we should only succeed in detaching a very shadowy figure, the founder of an order, not a real man. The truth is, the more the real character of St. Francis impresses itself upon the imagination, the less we are attracted by St. Dominic. He has no democratic sympathy, or quick human feeling. He is always the Spanish grandee, courtly but hard, more interested in the cause of the Church than in the souls of men. The very miracles recorded of him grate harshly on the ear accustomed to the naïveté and loveliness of the Franciscan stories. He kills a cock in a passion, and then restores it to life. Nothing so grotesque could occur in the Fioretti. It belongs to a different world. The miracles attributed to a saint are some index of his real character. St. Dominic attracted to himself none of the bright fancies of love and poetic feeling. We can hardly find the man behind the crude trappings of the hagiographer. Dr. Herkless continues his narrative so as to embrace the early activity of the two rival orders of mendicants, and readers who want a short and popular survey of their progress and degradation, and of their relations with the Inquisition and the Universities, will find it in these pages.

Miss Macdonell has given us a delightful book in her "Sons of Francis," and one for which readers who have no taste for the Latin of mediæval chroniclers ought to be grateful. She breaks fresh ground, and introduces us to a series of portraits of the early followers of the saint, as unfamiliar to most people as they are full of charm. Nos qui cum eo fuimus (a series of sketches of the first companions), Frate Elias, John of Parma, Salimbene of Parma, Angelo Clareno, Jacopone da Todi are among the subjects dealt with. They all show wide reading of the original sources, and an acquaintance with the fluid state of opinion upon many questions of importance. Before, however, we refer to a few of these studies more in detail, we must turn aside for a moment to express our regret that Miss Macdonell has qualified the pleasure of reading her book by some extraordinary eccentricities of style. Nowhere does an affectation of smartness and familiarity seem more out of place, and we feel that to describe Salimbene as a "Pepysian Flibbertigibbet," Jacopone as "an awful warning," and someone else as "a gadabout" is an unpardonable offence against good writing and good taste. The habit also of inserting sentences in Italian which might just as well be translated is not really picturesque, and to some readers must be simply bewildering. We hope that, if another edition is called for, Miss Macdonell, remembering her own criticism of Affò, the eighteenth century biographer of John of Parma, will restrain the flourishes of her pen and stick to sober historical narrative.

Taken as a whole Miss Macdonell's book illustrates only one side of the early Franciscan movement. She makes no attempt to conceal her preference for "the Spirituals." "In the struggles between the two chief parties in the order," she writes, "I have ranged myself definitely on one side, and my reason is—Francis. Not that the other side was wanting in virtue, or talent, or interest, or in great personalities. It illustrated many excellent things—but it did not particularly illustrate Francis; and my interest in Franciscanism derives solely from its founder, and follows only where I see the traces of his spirit." Accordingly we look in vain for such commanding figures as those of Cardinal Ugolino and Bonaventura. There is, however, an interesting sketch of Brother Elias, which will probably send some readers to Dr. Lempp's able monograph "Frère Elie de Cortone" in Sabatier's Collection de Documents. After St. Francis himself he offers the best material to the biographer, a masterful spirit made for affairs of state, who by some strange freak of fortune fell under the fascination of the saint and afterwards could never find his true vocation in either world. Now that attention has has been called to the dramatic contrasts of his career, and his far-reaching influence upon the development of the order, other writers are likely to be attracted by the unsolved enigmas of his character.

We have not time to linger over the admirable sketch of John of Parma. It is curious that he has had no modern biographer, for alike in intellectual gifts, administrative zeal, and unaffected spirituality of temper, he seems to have far excelled most of the early Ministers General. In some respects Bonaventura came nearest to him, but there was in Bonaventura more than a tinge of ecclesiastical prudence and the love of domination. The quaint poetry of the Fioretti gives the best idea of the impression which John of Parma made upon his contemporaries. The story is related in the form of a vision which was seen by Brother Jacques of La Massa. It reflects, as the reader will perceive, the protest of the Spirituals against the growing worldliness of the Order :—

Then came St. Francis to give the chalice of life to his brothers, and he gave it first to John of Parma, who, taking it, drank it all in haste, devoutly ; and straightway he became all shining like the sun. And after him St. Francis gave it to all the other brothers in order, and there were but few among them that took it with due reverence and devotion, and drank it all. Those that took it devoutly and drank it all, became straightway shining like the sun ; but those that spilled it all and took it not devoutly, became black and dark, and misshapen, and horrible to see ; but those that drank part and spilled part, became partly shining and partly dark, and more or less so according to the measure of their drinking or spilling thereof. But the aforesaid Brother John was resplendent above all the rest, the which had more deeply drunk the chalice of life, whereby he had the more deeply gazed into the abyss of the infinite light divine.

The strangest figure in this Franciscan portrait gallery is that of Jacopone da Todi. Miss Macdonell's essay has sent us back to the chapters dealing with him in Les Poëtes Franciscaines by Ozanam Little has been done since Ozanam wrote to elucidate his work, or to make it more available.* A critical edition of the early Franciscan poetry would be a great boon. Meanwhile an essay like the one before us, slight as it is in texture, is of real service, if for no other reason because it makes us wish to penetrate further into an unexplored field. The life of Jacopone, in the sheer extravagance of its folly and its extraordinary protests against common sense and good taste, makes few appeals to the modern mind. Probably there was a strain of insanity in him. But he had the lyrical gift. He was a troubadour who turned his songs to religious uses, and St. Francis would have recognised in him some kinship of spirit. He had the Franciscan love of nature and the open air. He wishes to call all things in the universe to love and praise.

Voglio invitar tutto 'l mondo ad amare,
Le valli e i monti e le genti a cantare,
L'abisso e i cieli et tutt' acque del mare,
Che faccian' versi davanti al mio Amore.

In other moods he was a powerful satirist and could sing most excellently in praise of folly.

Plato and Socrates may contend,
And all the breath in their bodies spend,
Arguing without an end—
What's it all to me? . . .

Only a pure and simple mind
Straight to heaven its way doth find ;
Greets the King—while, far behind,
Lags the world's philosophy.

But he strikes his simplest and most musical note in his carols to the infant Christ, and the songs inspired by the joys and sorrows of motherhood. In their playful fancy and mystical rapture, we seem to recognise a forerunner of William Blake. The following is a good example which Miss Macdonell has translated for us :—

The little angels join their hands
And dance in holy ring.
Love songs they're whispering,
The little angel bards.

Good men and bad they call and greet :
High Glory doffs its crown,
And has come down,
Low lies there at your feet.

Now, shamefaced boors, why keep Ye back? Show courtesie.
Hasten and ye will see
The little Jesus sleep.

The earth and all the skiey space
Break into flowery smiles.
So draws and so beguiles
The sweetness of His face.

How truly Jacopone could depict the opposite mood of sorrow is seen in his stately Latin hymn, "Stabat Mater dolorosa," and still more in the pathetic lyric "O figlio caro figlio," written for the popular heart in its own speech. His later mood was one of mystical desire for absorption in the divine without even a care for his own salvation. He died in 1306 of old age, but the chronicler says also of "excess of love." Perhaps no one illustrates better what St. Francis meant when he called his followers "joculatores Dei," singers who move the hearts of men to spiritual joy.

We can devote only a few lines in conclusion to the interesting little book which Mr. Adderley and Mr. Marson have issued recently under the title "Third Orders." It contains a translation of the text of a rule for the Franciscan Tertiaries, which was discovered recently by M. Sabatier and published by him as the first part of the Opuscules de Critique Historique. The rule is considerably earlier than the one which was promulgated in 1289. It may go back to about the year 1230, and in any case it takes us closer to the original thought of St. Francis. His aim was not to be the founder of a new organisation, but to hold up an evangelical ideal of life before men. It was the drift of events, over which he had no control, which ultimately parted his followers into the three branches of a great religious order. We touch here upon the chief source of the fascination of these Franciscan studies. They bring us into close touch with a religious revival whose springs are to be found in the simple faith and idealism of the Christian heart. In the remarks and comments, which Mr. Adderley and Mr. Marson have added to the translation of this ancient rule, they have shown us again how strong is the appeal of these things to the religious imagination of to-day.

THE PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNALS.

FOR some time past the foremost position in the numbers of Mind has been generally occupied by a long paper from Mr. F. H. Bradley's pen. This series of papers, which apparently is still far from its close, is probably intended to form at length a large volume dealing critically with human volition. It is hardly possible to criticise these papers as they successively appear, for in each one of them important assumptions are made which, we are told, will be further explained and justified in future articles. There is, however, one feature in the July article which is worth calling attention to, for it shows that the Libertarianism which Mr. Bradley a few years ago recorded as practically defunct in all philosophical literature worth reading is now so much alive in the writings of some of the most influential thinkers of the day that it is no longer possible to ignore it. Accordingly, in the article in question he devotes considerable space to an examination of Professor William James's views on this subject, and he explains how he thinks it comes about that really intelligent persons like William James can actually assert that in seasons of temptation a man could have decided differently than he did decide.

If I am asked (he says) how, if these doctrines are really what I think them, they can possibly come to be upheld, I must answer as follows: I am forced to believe that these results are not got by an unprejudiced inquiry made direct into the real claims of our actual moral nature. Wherever they are reached they appear to be reached by reasoning downward from alternatives now long ago argued to be vicious. They come from our looking at morality while one eye glances at theological dogma. (P. 298.)

We admit that there is an element of truth in Mr. Bradley's last sentence, but we should give a very different account of it. It is perfectly true that the Free-will doctrine seldom holds its ground when dissociated from religious faith. True Ethics and true Religion are only two aspects of one individual reality ; and, as both Dr. Martineau and Professor F. W. Newman maintained, Free-will and Theism generally stand or fall together. This assertion of the intimate connection between Libertarianism and interest in religious worship appears to be to a large extent supported by the actual facts in our great universities.

Among the many important papers in the July number of Mind is a very interesting memorial notice of the late Professor Adamson, from the pen of Professor Sorley. We rejoice to hear that Professor Adamson has left important philosophical writings which are being prepared for publication by Professor Sorley, who will be assisted by Professor Adamson's old pupil and warm admirer, Dr. G. Dawes Hicks. There are some interesting reviews in both the July and October numbers on Dr. Howison's "Limits of Evolution," Professor Royce's Gifford Lectures, and Mr. Benjamin Kidd's "Principles of Western Civilisation."

* See, however, the section dealing with him in Gaspany's Early Italian Literature and the appended bibliographical notes.

The Philosophical Review for November contains an article of very great general interest on "Poetry and Philosophy," by Dr. R. B. Perry, of Harvard. In this paper Shakespeare's characteristics are most ably analysed and described. Great as he is he is not a philosophical poet.

His understanding was as rich as it was acute. It is true that Shakespeare read human life as an open book, knowing certainly the manner of human thinking and feeling, and the power and interplay of human motives. But it is equally true, on the other hand, that he possessed no unitary conception of the meaning and larger relations of human life. Such a conception might have been expressed either by means of the outlook of some dominating and persistent type of personality, or by a pervading suggestion of some constant world-setting for the variable enterprise of mankind. It could appear only provided the poet's appreciation of life in detail were determined by an interpretation of the meaning of life as a whole. Shakespeare apparently possessed no such interpretation.

In contrast with Shakespeare Omar Khayyam and Wordsworth are at once philosophers and poets, but unquestionably the supreme philosopher-poet is Dante :—

He is not only philosophical in the temper of his mind, but his greatest poem is the incarnation of a definite system of philosophy, the most definite the world has seen. That conception of the world which in the thirteenth century found argumentative and orderly expression in the Summa Theologice of Thomas of Aquino, and constituted the faith of the Church, is visualised by Dante and made the basis of an interpretation of life."

The International Journal of Ethics for October is a specially valuable and interesting number. As a confirmation of the statement that the belief in man's moral freedom is at present showing signs of vigorous life, we may call attention to a remarkably able defence of the libertarian position in an article on "The Practical Consciousness of Freedom," by Dr. R. B. Perry, from whose article in the Philosophical Review we have just quoted. At the close of his elaborate article Dr. Perry writes :—

We must conclude that a metaphysical theory which fails to provide for the freedom of real alternatives fails also to provide for responsibility. I have attempted in this discussion to deal with conceptions derived from the average moral consciousness. I have endeavoured to show that the practical conceptions of duty and responsibility imply a definite conception of freedom. This conception of freedom has been found to involve a metaphysical conception of fundamental importance, and a conception that is antagonistic alike to the temporal determinism of naturalism, and the supertemporal determinism of idealism. When the human individual believes that he is responsible for the fulfilment or violation of his duty, he believes that he inhabits a universe which permits a selection from among genuine possibilities and suffers absolute change.

There is in this number another paper which is exceptionally valuable as a support to the religious interpretation of the universe, and we wish we had space to summarise its forcible reasoning. It is on "Mind and Nature"; and the burden of it is to prove that Nature, so far from being a merely mechanical and irrational process, bears clear marks of being animated and directed by a grand spiritual life and meaning.

If (concludes the writer) our view of Nature is in principle correct, it will follow that we have the best ground for trusting in that witness of immediate experience which seems, at our times of peaceful insight at least, to assure us that Nature is not indifferent to our ethical aims and struggles. . . . We shall not fail to insist that the vision of an indifferent or immoral Nature "red in tooth and claw," which haunts and oppresses so many of the best minds of our time, appears in the light of our conclusion no more than a nightmare of the judgment. Our result has proved the justification rather of those greater poets who have found in Nature a principle akin at the heart to all that makes for what is best in man. Perhaps as we survey the tangled web of physical happening, the phrase which will best express our mingled faith and diffidence will not be much unlike Stevenson's saying :—"It is a strange world; but there is a manifest God in it for those who care to look for him."

This impressive paper is written by Mr. A. E. Taylor, of Owens College, Manchester. He is a disciple of Mr. Bradley of Oxford, and therefore hails from the opposite quarter of the philosophical world to that which Dr. Perry and the Libertarians occupy; but the comparison of these two papers which appear side by side in this number of the International Journal of Ethics affords a most striking illustration of the truth that, notwithstanding the serious differences of opinion among our philosophical leaders, there is nevertheless a vast and most fertile tract of assured belief which is held in common by all the world's greatest thinkers, a region in which they can most heartily collaborate, and by their concurrent labours increase and develop the mental resources of humanity.

CHARLES B. UPTON.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

THE place of honour in this month's Contemporary is given to M. Paul Sabatier's address on "St. Francis and the Twentieth Century," given at the recent meeting of the Christian Conference in London. This is followed by a long article on "Catholicism versus Ultramontanism," furnishing abundant evidence of the strong resentment felt among the more enlightened and earnest Roman Catholics against the present policy of the Vatican, bent on political dominance rather than the maintenance of spiritual religion, The position taken up in this article, which is signed "Voces Catholicæ," will be seen from the following passage :—

A group of Italian ecclesiastics, infallible—not by the grace of God but by the credulity of man—in science and politics, absolute leaders of the masses, bent upon regaining temporal power, at all costs, undermining the monarchical principle throughout Italy in order to reinstate it in Rome, disavowing it in France, preconising it in Russia, decorating the German persecutor of the Church with the Order of Christ, and then condemning Germany and its allies as instruments of Christ's enemies—that is the ideal of Ultramontanism, which has little in common with the religion of the Catholic Church. Drawn thus irresistibly towards material wealth and political power, Ultramontanism assumes an attitude towards ethics which is alien to that of the Catholic Church.

Writing in an article "Thus Far," on the education question, Mr. J. A. Spender says: "The Bill as it stands leaves its Liberal opponents but one remedy, which is the drastic one of disestablishing the sectarian managers and thus demolishing the whole fabric on which the Church has elected to stand." The Hon. Stephen Coleridge, in a letter to the Editor on "Vivisection Experiments and the Mortality Returns," vigorously continues his duel with Mr. Stephen Paget. The article on "The Russian Temperance Committees," by Edith Sellers, should by no means be overlooked.

To the Nineteenth Century and After Sir Oliver Lodge contributes a timely warning on the subject of "Our Public Schools as a Public Peril," trenchantly pointing to the poverty of their intellectual ideal. The Duke of Northumberland writes on "Religion and Physical Science," not very clearly defining the strength of the scientific position as opposed to theological assumptions in the field of natural knowledge, but concluding with the following suggestive passage :—

Professor Dewar asserts that science adopts a humble and a reverent attitude. He confesses on her behalf her "ignorance of the ultimate nature of matter, of the ultimate nature of energy, and still more of the origin and ultimate synthesis of the two!" Nay, further, he regards the mystery of matter as inscrutable. One of the greatest theologians who ever existed asserted an equal humility for theology more than 1,800 years ago, when he declared that he saw through a glass darkly, and knew only in part. Whether the theologian and the natural philosopher will ever see perfectly eye to eye until both stand face to face with Him whose actings they alike study, and know even as they are known, may well be doubted. But every true advance achieved by either must necessarily tend to bring them to the same goal, however temporarily divergent the winding and intricate paths leading thereto may appear to be. Theology, no less than natural science (to quote after Professor Dewar the noble words of Lord Kelvin), is bound by the everlasting law of honour to face fearlessly every problem that can fairly be presented to it; and to assert its right to range over every domain of theory with absolute freedom. It is not by elbowing out her sister that either will promote her own true interests, but by patient and tolerant occupation and development of a field amply sufficient for both to seek to advance side by side from one conquest to another till both shall join hands in the full enlightenment of the perfect day.

Mr. R. E. Dell contributes to the Monthly Review a striking article on "Democracy and the Temporal Power," with searching criticism of the temporal policy of Rome, and a plea for the ideal of a truer independence to be gained by "the abandonment of wordly ambitions and political entanglements, a wholehearted reliance on spiritual and moral claims, and a frank appeal to the soul and conscience of mankind." The illustrated article this month is a fifth in the series on "The Painters of Japan."

To the National Review Sir Leslie Stephen contributes an interesting article on "Browning's Casuistry," which opens with the following sentences :—

Mr. Stopford Brooke's recent volume upon Browning seems to me to present a rare combination of cordial appreciation and thorough sanity. Nobody can tell whether the most judicious verdict of to-day will be endorsed by the critics of a century hence. It can hardly be doubted, indeed, that those gentlemen will accept Browning as one of the greatest of English poets; and, on the other hand, that they will hold, in spite of the Browning Society, that a very large part of his work was not poetry at all.

When, like Rabbi Ben Ezra, they come to "discern and pronounce a last," they will "leave the fire ashes" though "what survives will be gold." Like most, if not all, other poets, Browning will be virtually read in selections. Perhaps the surplus will be reprinted; but it will be "taken as read," except by the curious. Mr. Stopford Brooke endeavours to anticipate the results of this expurgatory process. I believe in his forecast, and if I cannot quite follow him in some points, I fully admit that he is more likely to be right than I.

In the Fortnightly will be found the address on "Race and Religion," given last May by Sir A. C. Lyall as President of the Social and Political Education League, and also Sir Squire Bancroft's "First and Last Sermon," delivered at the Diocesan Conference at Leeds in October, on the invitation of the Bishop of Ripon, "On Preaching and Reading the Gospel."

SHORT NOTICES.

The annual volume of Young Days (Vol. XXVII. this year) is welcome, as ever, towards Christmas-time. Those who take in the little magazine from month to month know how bright and full of interest it is, and the completed volume, with its charming coloured frontispiece by Kathleen Lucas, may be confidently recommended as a Christmas present for the children. (People who want guidance in the selection of children's books for presents should also send for the admirable classified list issued annually by the S.S.A.) Through this volume of Young Days runs a serial story by Miss Theodora Mills called "Father's Manuscript; or, What Happened at Pen Porth." There are also twelve of the Rev. Thomas Robinson's delightful illustrated papers on "Mother Nature's Wondrous Ways"; a series of Temperance Lessons, and a great variety of anecdotes and short stories. Both the children and their elders have reason to be grateful to the Editor, the Rev. J. J. Wright, for what he does in this most wholesome of children's magazines "for home and school." (Sunday School Association, Essex Hall. 1s. 6d. net.)

Even in mid-winter Mr. W. T. Palmer's Lake-Country Rambles are delightful reading. Indeed, this collection of sketches belongs to every season of the year, telling not only of summer walks, and mountain climbs by day and night, but of springtime, autumn, and winter, giving the vivid impressions of one who has lived for many years in that glorious country and knows it by heart. "Shepherding on the Fells in Winter," and "Skating on Windermere," are two of the chapters, as characteristic as the "May-Day Ramble" of Mr. Palmer's enthusiasm and his close touch with the life of the District. (Chatto and Windus. 6s.)

The Hampshire edition of Jane Austen's Novels, to which we have already referred with pleasure, is now complete, in quaint binding and admirably clear type. Of the six volumes, Persuasion and Northanger Abbey cost 2s. each net.; the others 2s. 6d. The set in a box can be had for 15s. net., or in leather binding £1. (R. Brimley Johnson.)

In the series of Oxford Miniature Poets three volumes are devoted to Longfellow, of which the one we have received contains the "Tales of a Wayside Inn," "The Golden Legend," and the "New England Tragedies." The stout little volume contains over 1,000 pages of India paper, and the type is so large that people who read in trains would find the little book quite serviceable. (Henry Frowde, Oxford University Press Warehouse. 3s. 6d.)

Realities of Life is the title of a little book of extracts, "being Thoughts gathered from the Teachings of the Rev. H. R. Haweis, M.A.," with a portrait, and a brief Introduction and Memoir by Jessie M. Oliver. (Elliot Stock. 3s. 6d.)

William Penn's No Cross No Crown, with an Introduction by J. Deane Hilton, issued in the same form as Dean Plumtre's "Dante" and "Sophocles," and the small two-volume edition of Mr. Stopford Brooke's "Tennyson," in limp leather binding, furnishes a very welcome edition of this well-known Quaker classic. (Isbister and Co. 2s. 6d. net.)

To the "York Library" is added a dainty little edition of Spenser's Amoretti, including the Prothalamion and Epithalamion, with an etching of an old portrait as frontispiece. (R. Brimley Johnson. 2s. 6d. net.)

The Gipsy's Charm, a children's operetta, by A. H. Biggs, M.A., has already been given with éclat and with great enjoyment to the performers, as we understand, at the Blackfriars Mission, and is to be commended to the attention of those who are in search for such entertainment. Both libretto and music are the work of Mr. Biggs's versatile genius for giving pleasure to young people, and in the preparation of such a piece no less than in its performance they may find not only much amusement, but good discipline. The secret of the story we will not reveal. (Weekes and Co., 14, Hanover-street, W. Libretto 4d. net. Music 6d. net.)

The Essex Hall Pocket Almanac for 1903, the perennial friend of faithful and methodical Unitarians, is out in good time with its diary and lists of ministers and churches. Fuller information, as our readers are aware, is contained in the Year Book, which will be issued soon after Christmas. Easter Sunday next year is on April 12, Whit Sunday on May 31. (B. and F.U.A. Essex Hall. 1s. net.)

After all The Pilot was not to die. Generous friends came to the rescue, and last Saturday the issue was resumed. It was sleep, not death, The Pilot says. Having now found his sea-legs, all good wishes for a prosperous course!

Many friends will rejoice to hear that the Freedom of the City of Manchester is to be conferred upon Alderman Harry Rawson, to whose public services and personal worth we have recently had occasion to bear grateful testimony.

At a meeting held at Essex Hall on Wednesday evening, it was decided to form a "Sociological Society" for the free discussion of questions of Philosophy, Ethics and Sociology. The following officers were elected:—President, Rev. R. H. Greaves; Vice-President, Rev. J. H. Wicksteed; Treasurer, Mr. F. E. Hamel; Secretary, Mr. G. Wynn Westcott, Athenæum House, Camden-road, N. Meetings are to be held monthly, the first regular meeting to be held in January.

OBITUARY.

THE REV. J. PANTON HAM.

The Rev. James Panton Ham, whose death occurred on Monday at his residence in Belfast, was a native of Hackney, where he was born in 1819. He was educated for the ministry at Cheshunt College, and in 1845 became minister of the Countess of Huntingdon Chapel at Maidenhead. Two years later he was appointed minister of a chapel of the same denomination in Bristol. There his intellectual activity led him to question the chief articles of the Calvinistic faith, and he was compelled to resign by the strict terms of the chapel deed. His eloquent and thoughtful preaching had attracted a large congregation, by nearly all of whom he was followed to the Public Hall in College Green; and eventually a Congregational Free Church on the broadest principles was founded in Cooper's Hall, an account of which appeared in the Christian Reformer for 1852, under the title of "Creeds and Controversies in Bristol," written by the late Rev. William James, of Lewin's Mead Chapel in that city. But the Free Church had few or no men of means connected with it, and Mr. Ham sought closer connection with Unitarians, with whom he had much theological sympathy. It is interesting to note that he and the late Rev. William Forster, of the Congregational Church at Kentish Town, were introduced at the same time to the annual meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, held at Hackney at Whitsuntide, 1854, and delivered excellent addresses in acknowledgment of a cordial vote of welcome. In the same year Mr. Ham was invited to Cross-street Chapel, Manchester, as colleague of the Rev. William Gaskell, who became senior minister on the death of the Rev. J. G. Robberds, and here he remained for nearly five years—probably the happiest years of his varied life—preaching with much acceptance to the large congregation that then nearly filled that venerable chapel. In 1859 Mr. Ham was invited to Essex-street Chapel, London, as colleague of the Rev. Thomas Madge. Not long afterwards Mr. Madge retired from regular duty, although retaining an honorary connection with the pulpit. With Mr. Madge's retirement several valued families who came out of personal regard to their old minister from considerable distances gradually withdrew; the rise of new chapels in rapid succession at Kentish Town, Croydon, and Islington, attracted others living in these respective localities. Unfortunate congregational dissensions occurred, and the congregation was reduced to the shadow of what it had been. After a ministry of twenty-four years at Essex-street (1859-83) Mr. Ham retired in order to facilitate a scheme approved by the Charity Commissioners for the sale of the chapel and its conversion into a hall for denominational purposes "having a wider scope than the original trust deed permitted." The present Essex Church was another result of that scheme, a considerable sum having been raised for the purpose of carrying it out. After an interval Mr. Ham became minister for a few years of the Kentish Town Chapel, founded by the late Rev. William Forster. During the greater part of his London ministry Mr. Ham took private pupils, chiefly in connection with University College School, among them several Japanese students, some of whom afterwards rose to the highest positions in their native land. Mr. Ham published two novels—one with the singular title "The Deuce of Aces"—which were favourably reviewed in THE INQUIRER and elsewhere. He contributed occasional reviews to this journal, and published a few doctrinal pamphlets and sermons, chiefly at the time of his connection with the Free Christian Church at Bristol when he fought a hard battle with Orthodox opponents. He was too much occupied in his private affairs to take an active part in denominational matters in London, but was a trustee of Dr. Williams's Library for many years, and for a short time on the B. and F.U.A. Committee After his retirement he lived in succession at Southsea, South Norwood, and finally removed first to Dublin and last to Belfast to be near his two married daughters, one the widow of the late Dr. Kidd, formerly President of the Royal College of Physicians (Ireland), and the other the wife of Mr. G. G. Ward, of Belfast. Mr. Ham was a man of bright sunny nature and of many accomplishments, but his ministry in London with two decaying congregations in succession was not of a kind to develop his highest powers, and he would probably have been happier and more permanently successful as minister of a Free Christian Church such as that he attempted to found in Bristol fifty years ago.

THE CLEANSING FIRE.

HERE may thy fevered soul
Cast anchor and be still,
Assured that thou canst reach no goal
Unsanctioned by His will.

His love stands sentinel
O'er ways He hath not blest;
With fiery sword He doth compel
And wayward feet arrest.

What He permits is right;
He knows the need of each—
Thou canst not wander from His sight,
Nor stray beyond His reach.

And not the direst ill
That may thy soul o'ertake
But is permitted by His will,
And for thy safety's sake.

The dreaded ill shall prove
To thee a cleansing fire,
The stern appointment of a love
That seeks to draw thee higher.

This solemn faith retain
That all comes from His hand,
That thou canst know no grief nor pain
But comes at His command.

No cross, no bitter shame,
No penalty for sin,
But hath its one redeeming aim—
To make thee pure within.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

"I COULDN'T help it: he made me do it."

How often children say this!

But is either part of the sentence true?

No doubt it was a temptation; but you knew it was wrong, or you would not try to excuse yourself by saying first that you couldn't help it, and next that he made you do it. And what are temptations for? Are they sent to us in order that we may yield to them at once? No, they are sent to us because we are able to choose what is right or to choose what is wrong, and to try whether the love of right is stronger than the desire for some pleasure or ease which the wrong choice may bring us. We know this quite well, and, when a temptation comes, if we give in to it we have a feeling of shame, and this it is that makes us say "I couldn't help it"; but in our hearts we know that we could help it, but that to resist was, perhaps, too much trouble, or that the pleasure we expected from yielding called to us so strongly that we did not mean to resist the temptation. But a good fight with temptation makes you strong; and if you had stood up like a man to your enemy and fought him, you would not have been tempted to say "I couldn't help it." "Fight and conquer, or die," is what we should say when temptation comes; not "I couldn't help it," and "he made me do it."

How did he make you do it?

Perhaps he laughed at you for hesitating; perhaps he set you the example, by doing the same himself; perhaps he teased you into it, or bribed you by promising you something if you would do it.

But then where was your real self? Surely that weak and flimsy thing that could not bear to be laughed at, or go its own way instead of following another, or stand being teased, or see the meanness of a bribe, was not really you? It was a weak and feeble creature whom you despise; and your real self has a will of its own that can resist, and a conscience which knows what is right and can do it. No one on earth can "make" you do anything that you know to be wrong. All that you need is to have your real and best self awake—not lazily sleeping so that you are led away without resistance.

A boy at school was led away by temptation to do a very wrong thing. His father heard of it, and when Tom came home he talked to him about it. Tom felt angry, and said, "I couldn't help it; Smith made me do it." His father showed him that that was no excuse, and that he had done very wrong. Tom was silent and sulky; but he felt very uncomfortable; for though he would not own, even to himself, that he was sorry, much less to anyone else, he did dimly feel that he had done wrong, and had been very weak as well as naughty. When he went to his room at night and opened the drawer to take out his brush and comb, he found a paper lying on the brush. He took it up and looked at it; it contained these words: "God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that you are able, but will with the temptation also make a way to escape, that ye may be able to bear it." And below was added, "The eternal God is thy refuge, and underneath are the everlasting arms."

Tom stood still for a long time with the words in his hand. It was as if a great light had burst out in his soul. He saw it all now.

He presently put out the light and crept into bed, and lay with his eyes very wide open and the paper in his hand; and when he awoke in the morning it was there still. He looked at it again, and then for the first time knew that his father had written it. He went back to school a stronger boy.

Do you know the old story in the book of Daniel, of Nebuchadnezzar, King of Babylon, making an immense golden image which he set up in an open plain? He made a decree that every person of every class was to bow down to this image as a god; and ordered that everyone who did not do so should be thrown into a fiery furnace. The order was obeyed by everyone; till at last it was told to the king that there were three Jews, whom he had himself set up as governors in the province of Babylon, and that these men worshipped other gods, and had not yet bowed down to the image. So Nebuchadnezzar sent for them, and Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego were brought to him, and he ordered them to bow down to the image, or they should be thrown into the furnace. They answered, "If it be so, our God whom we serve is able to deliver us from the burning fiery furnace, and he will deliver us out of thine hand, O King. But if not, be it known unto thee, O King, that we will not serve thy gods, nor worship the golden image which thou hast set up."

Then the story goes on to tell how the three faithful Jews were thrown into the furnace, but it did not burn them; and when the King saw it he recognised that their God had saved them, and he ordered that no one should say anything against the God of these men; and he restored them to honour.

Do not you think it is fine that they believed in their God being able to save them even from a death of torture; nevertheless, if not, nothing would make them save themselves by doing what was false? And the end of the story is fine, as showing that even the fire of the furnace could not touch or change the true souls that were faithful.

And that is the spirit in which to stand up to our temptations. "We will not be unfaithful; God will not allow us to be tempted beyond what we can bear: He will perhaps save us from suffering—but if not, we will not do wrong."

"And underneath are the everlasting arms."

GERTRUDE MARTINEAU.

WE hear with much pleasure that in connection with one of our local Associations, the South-Eastern Provincial Assembly, an auxiliary fund has been formed to give additional help to the smaller-salaried ministers in the Province towards paying the premiums under the scheme of the Ministers' Pension Fund. Although that Fund liberally offers, in ordinary cases, to pay half the premiums, there are undoubtedly many to whom the difficulty of raising the other half is a serious one; and the example set by London and the South-east may be warmly commended to other districts.

LONDON, DECEMBER 13, 1902.

TO THE POOR THE GOSPEL IS PREACHED.

EVERY year, as the Christmas season comes on, we are reminded by the appeals of ministers whose work lies in the poorest districts of our great cities, of the pathetic needs, which do not indeed belong only to this season, but during the cold winter days grow heavier and are more acutely felt, and for which at this season above all others appeal to brotherly kindness can be most confidently made.

We beg of our readers very earnestly to consider these appeals, which are printed at the head of the "News from the Churches" column this week and in our last two numbers, and not to leave them without ample response. It is through our Domestic Missions that the churches are brought into closest touch with the poor, and this is a common service, the responsibility of which is laid on all alike. We bear the name of CHRIST. Our hearts respond to the appeal of human brotherhood; our churches declare that great truth; but if the Gospel is indeed to be preached to the poorest of the poor, it must be through personal contact in their homes, in the direct ministrations of brotherly kindness. This is the work of our Domestic Missionaries, in which they are sustained by many devoted helpers, gathered chiefly from the churches of our fellowship. Thus the churches make their most direct contribution to this Christ-like work, together with the material support by which they maintain the Missions. But now come these reminders from the Missionaries of further needs; money and gifts to meet urgent cases of distress, to brighten the Christmas season, to bring some warmth into bare homes in bitter weather, with the gladness of the children and the comfort of the aged, to bring the touch of a genuine sympathy to all alike. Many earnest people hesitate to respond to sensational appeals in times of special stress, but none need fear to trust these devoted workers, who know their people, and can use more than all that will be given in wise and helpful charity.

In London, from the very vastness of the city, there is special need to remind our people of where their gifts should be bestowed, and in Manchester also the scattered churches of the district need to realise more fully the claims upon their faithfulness which the Missions rightly make. In other great cities, such as Birmingham and Liverpool, the Missions are perhaps in closer touch with the churches, and their needs are furnished without the necessity for such a printed appeal. But we ask our readers to refer to page 77 of the Essex Hall Year Book, where they will find a list of eighteen Domestic Missions, five in London, three each in Birmingham, Liverpool, and Manchester, and one each in Belfast, Bristol, Croydon, and Leicester. These all make their silent appeal, and there are other churches with similar needs, in their work among the neglected poor. They appeal, not only to friends close at hand, but to our whole community, to all who have anything to give, in the unity of Christian brotherhood, to make the great confession of their faith and love, in helping those who have the sorest need.

A little sparing from our abundant means, or—more blessed still—a little sparing from our scanty store, with humble but heartfelt self-denial, and if only all will help, the great work is done, and the Gospel is preached indeed in the darkest places of our common life. Let the children help, give them the happiness of sending gifts. Let surprise gifts come from far away—whether it be a box of toys, a parcel of clothing, a cheque or postal order. Then will the spirit of concord and rejoicing draw us all more closely together, and through our single-hearted faithfulness the Divine tenderness and compassion, the FATHER'S over-shadowing love, will be brought a little nearer, and even through such humble means, those who sit in darkness will see the Great Light.

MR. BALFOUR AND DR. CLIFFORD.

THE attention of Mr. BALFOUR was directed, he tells us, by Captain MIDDLETON, the Conservative agent, to the pamphlet containing Dr. CLIFFORD'S letters on the Education Bill. It is no wonder that the party organisers perceived the need of some counterblast to these letters, which, supplemented by their author's speeches, have certainly played no unimportant part in the recent contested elections. Whether Mr. BALFOUR'S reply, which also takes the form of a pamphlet, will remedy the damage done to the Unionist party by the policy adopted in this Bill is a matter which may be doubted. The Prime Minister exhibits, indeed, much power, and fences with graceful agility; and no doubt all those who were already convinced of the merits of the Bill will regard his arguments as conclusive. If we set off against this class of reader those who are too deeply prejudiced against it to be open to conviction there remains the question of the vast bulk of the electors who are only to be successfully approached on plain issues, and convinced by "popular" illustrations. As rival pronouncements the two pamphlets have very different merits, and probably the Baptist preacher would gladly concede all that the Prime Minister urges in depreciation of his "style" if he could be sure that in their effective power with the electors his letters remain substantially unimpaired.

On the whole, we think Dr. CLIFFORD'S friends need not doubt that this is so. There is (of course, shall we say?) in the popular preacher's method much that excites the derision of the delicate-minded critic who is at the head of the Government. We may go further, and candidly admit that not only in style but in statement his letters have appeared to our own more sympathetic minds as florid and exaggerative. Mr. BALFOUR has no difficulty in proving, for instance, that it is not absolutely accurate to say "the whole cost" of education in the "non-provided" schools will be borne by the ratepayers, and the "whole control" will be in the hands of the parson. But while these "large" ways of putting things are not wholly justifiable in the court of strict inquiry, they may be actually so near the truth as to be treated as venial offences.

The broad facts remain quite untouched by Mr. BALFOUR'S animadversions on Dr. CLIFFORD. In the first place, the Bill promises to do for the clerical schools far beyond what the Archbishop of CANTERBURY five years ago thought possible.

In return for a disputable value in real property, which is held by denominational trustees but which has by no means been created wholly out of "Church" subscriptions, as many of our readers resident in different parts of the country could testify, and towards which the State has contributed large sums, the Church and the clergy are placed in a position distinctly superior to all the rest of the community. A permanent majority of two-thirds is guaranteed to their representatives on boards of management, and if this is not enough for "full control" it is difficult to say what is. Lord ROSEBERY is not a fiery pamphleteer, and his description of a system set up by the Bill is that "the Church of England is to have the education in its schools entirely maintained by public funds, and entirely controlled by close corporations." Mr. BALFOUR twits Dr. CLIFFORD with dragging in historical references, and, so to speak, wonders what thunder he would have left if a really vital constitutional issue were at stake. But it is the vice of the typical "Church" advocate that he fails to discern how indignantly non-church people regard his claims for exceptional treatment towards the establishment. Let it be imagined that a Prime Minister could ever be so bold as to suggest that any other institutions than denominational schools should receive direct support from the rates and yet remain practically in the hands of private managers — would there not be an outcry? Lord ROSEBERY's opinion is that the Bill "undermines all that we have understood to be the basis of our constitutional structure in this country, and makes us almost wonder whether many generations of civil and religious freedom must not have been wiped out of the memory of the people of England." When an ex-Prime Minister, who is not a Nonconformist, feels like this, it is not to be wondered at that a representative of the Puritan element in our national life should appeal to his countrymen not to forget HAMPDEN, PYM, and CROMWELL.

We are promised a further series of letters by Dr. CLIFFORD, and in these he will be wise, if we may say so, to give the enemy as little cause to blaspheme as possible, by crediting the utmost to the "Church" case. It is bad enough at the best, and so bad that one wonders more and more how so many of the rank and file of the Conservative party, to say nothing of Liberal Unionists, have allowed themselves to accept the Bill as even a tolerable measure. What with flouting the principle of popular self-government, permanently excluding Nonconformist masters and mistresses from thousands of publicly-maintained schools, and wantonly destroying the great School Boards, whose system has grown up into ever-extending usefulness year by year, it is a measure to create alarm and forebodings of reactions worse than any we have yet seen.

SCHWARZ DEFENCE FUND.

AN APPEAL.

AT the instance of the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Freiburg-in-Baden, proceedings have been instituted against Mr. Gottfried Schwarz, of Heidelberg, on the charge of insulting the Roman Catholic Church in two recent numbers of his magazine, The Banner of Freedom. The MSS. and remaining copies of these writings have been seized by the police. The trial is fixed for January next, and the maximum penalty is three years' imprisonment.

The undersigned, who either know Mr. Schwarz personally or are well acquainted with his writings, venture to appeal for subscriptions to help him to make the best defence possible, and to meet some of the expenses caused by this prosecution. Among the reasons which induce them to recommend his case to the sympathy of the public are:—

(1.) That the invocation of the law, with its extreme penalty of imprisonment, in order to suppress independent discussion of religious matters is injurious to the cause of true religion and the rights of free speech.

(2.) That while we would not be understood as necessarily approving of Mr. Schwarz's opinions and arguments in the incriminated writings, and while we do, in fact, disapprove of some of his expressions on the ground that, though not uncommon among those who regard the Pope as Antichrist, they appear to us to be exaggerated and unfortunate; yet nevertheless we are agreed that these writings have been produced in perfect good faith, and from a sincere and earnest desire to advance the cause of spiritual religion.

(3.) That Mr. Schwarz's personal history and writings prove him to be a faithful and fearless servant of religious freedom and truth. Twice in his ministerial career he has sacrificed his means of livelihood rather than preach what he could no longer believe. Since 1894 he has devoted himself to lecturing and writing on behalf of a Christianity freed from traditional dogmas and ecclesiastical authority. Though his monthly magazine, the Banner of Freedom, founded "for the restoration of the religion of Jesus," has not always, and never more than, paid its cost, he has published it regularly for over seven years.

(4.) That Mr. Schwarz's labours on behalf of a free Christianity have been carried out since 1894 without payment, on his own initiative; that he has no resources to enable him to meet special expenses such as this trial necessarily involves; that he has no organisation or society behind him to support him in his plea for the right of free speech; and that if convicted, his family will lose their chief means of support so long as he is in prison.

We therefore appeal on his behalf to a public which has always defended the right of the individual to the free utterance of his honest convictions, and which has always shown itself sympathetic towards loyalty to conscience.

WE hear from the secretary of the Unitarian Home Missionary College that with the approval of Mr. Rawson the committee of the Harry Rawson Portrait Fund have applied the balance of the Fund, amounting to £108 19s. 8d., in the foundation at the College of a prize called "The Harry Rawson Prize," to be awarded for proficiency in English language and literature, subjects which Mr. Rawson has himself chosen. The foundation of the prize and its association with the name of Mr. Harry Rawson is deeply appreciated by the Committee of the College, and their satisfaction will be shared by all friends of the institution.

LETTER FROM BRUSSELS.

IT is very reluctantly that year after year, in the same monotonous strain, we appeal to our English Unitarian friends for pecuniary help. They must be weary of hearing of our everlasting lawsuits, but we can assure them they are not half so weary as we are, after eight long years of litigation. We have not progressed one step since last December. We had fondly hoped to obtain the decision of the Court of Appeal before the end of the year, but as the case is not yet called we must give up this hope and resign ourselves to further waiting. So we have again to meet the same financial difficulty. Our expenses amount to £206 7s., and our receipts up to the present to £163 6s. 7d., and we cannot hope for much more from our people, who have done their best. We shall certainly be at least £40 short unless our kind English benefactors remember us again. I do not mention our outstanding debt of £68 16s., which we leave to be dealt with in better times, but which we are very desirous of not increasing.

I am happy to say that our congregations have been good this winter. At Brussels our hall has been several times nicely filled, and at Ghent, at our last meeting, a friend counted forty-five hearers, nearly all men. We have endeavoured, and not without success, to attract public attention by a series of discourses on Monasticism, and we have found the subject full, not only of historical and polemical interest to people who, like nearly all our members, were born and brought up in Catholicism, but also of religious and moral teaching. We have been especially encouraged by the admittance into our membership of a lady well known in Brussels society. And I may, perhaps, gently whisper the rather amusing fact that she bears the same name as, and is a relative of, the present burgomaster of the city, who has always been a strenuous opponent of our legal recognition, and who, when échevin or alderman, initiated the legal proceedings against us. We have again been astonished to discover from certain facts how far the wind sometimes carries the seed we sow. In the month of April I had a correspondence with a gentleman living in Lyons who had read one of our tracts. He had intended becoming a priest, but his studies had turned him away from Catholicism, and in his search for a new religious home he felt himself drawn to the old Jewish faith, which he believed to be the faith of Jesus. He wrote consulting me about the advisability of going over to Judaism. I endeavoured to point out to him that Unitarianism offered the same advantages as Judaism without its limitations. But I suppose I failed to convince him, as he dropped the correspondence.

Last month I received from a railway engineer in Roumania inquiries about Unitarianism and about the best French commentary on the Bible for family reading. I imagine that, like many Roumanians, this gentleman studied at Brussels or at Ghent, and came thus, without my knowledge, in contact with our work.

We are thankful for any signs that we have not worked in vain for the last twenty-one years. Last Sunday our church reached its majority. Unfortunately I am feeling the fatigue of age; and perhaps, also, if my doctor is right, of overwork. If we had money it would be high time for a younger and stronger man to come into the field. Our brave and faithful little congregations are willing to labour and struggle on, in the hope of promoting and witnessing the awakening of Belgium from the errors and superstitions of Catholicism; and whatever may be decided by the courts in Germany with regard to Mr. Schwarz, I do not consider the accusation of fetishism as too strong for the worship of miraculous images and other material objects which is rife in the popular classes here.

There is evidently something very serious going on in French Catholicism. Pastor Bourrier, an ex-priest, declares himself able to prove from well-kept lists open to inspection that during the last few years 800 priests or monks have left Catholicism. Mr. Turinaz, Bishop of Nancy, commenting on these assertions, declares that even allowing for exaggeration the situation remains absolutely appalling. Belgium generally follows the lead of France, and though it is proverbially slow to move, have we not some grounds for hoping that, perhaps when we are gone, others will see it move on towards a more rational, more spiritual, more life-giving form of Christianity.

CORRESPONDENCE.

CENTRAL POSTAL MISSION AND UNITARIAN WORKERS' UNION.

SIR,—We desire to draw attention to the soirée and Conference advertised in your columns to take place on Friday, Dec. 19.

We are inaugurating a series of gatherings at Essex Hall somewhat similar to the pleasant meetings of the Liberal Social Union held in old times; of a social character, but to include short papers and discussion on subjects of general interest bearing on religion.

We desire to make this widely known, and hope this invitation may catch the eye of Postal Mission correspondents and others who feel isolated and who may like to come together for social intercourse and conference.

We hope that London friends will attend in good numbers and join with us in making these gatherings bright and pleasant, and that members of the Pink Party will take the opportunity of meeting old friends.

The kindly hospitality offered to our excursion parties in Cardigan this summer, fresh in our memory, makes us specially desirous to welcome any Welsh men or women who may be in London just now.

Invitation cards may be had on application to Lady Wilson, 86, Church-road, Richmond.

Signed on behalf of the Committee,

M. LUCY TAGART, President.
LADY WILSON, Hon. Treasurer.

ROBERT BLATCHFORD ON MORALS AND WAGES.

I AM told by a friend, a wholesale newsagent in the North, that Robert Blatchford's book, "Britain for the British," seems likely to be as popular as his "Merrie England." My copy of the latter, dated 1894, belongs to the "sixth edition, completing 600,000 copies." Its 200 fairly-printed pages are sold at one penny. "Britain for the British" is not quite so large, and will probably soon appear at the same price. Evidently Robert Blatchford is one of the most widely-read authors of the day. His books and The Clarion make him one of the strong personal forces moulding our democratic life. It is therefore important to take note of what he is saying.

I pity the person who can read any of Robert Blatchford's more serious writing without feeling respect for the man and certain of his qualities. He has a terse, vigorous and picturesque style. He can drive home a point with a telling illustration. He can make his appeals in simple, vivid words. He can indulge in genial banter, and awaken deep sympathy for the wronged and suffering. He evidently wishes to be fair, but he can strongly denounce. He can collect quotations industriously and argue tenaciously. He has convictions for which he reasons with the earnestness and courage of an apostle.

It is not surprising then that Robert Blatchford is popular, and let no one refuse him his due. But even the sum of the qualities I have named is not sufficient to make an accurate thinker upon economic subjects or a wise political leader. The noblest of them, the sense of apostleship, may have precisely the contrary effect. For that sense, if prematurely developed, produces the unlearning dogmatist and the unthinking preacher of a panacea. In "Britain for the British" (p. 6) we read:—

> I have been engaged for more than a dozen years in studying political economy and Socialism, and in trying, as a Socialist, pressman, and author, to explain Socialism and to confute the arguments and answer the objections of non-Socialists, and I say, without any hesitation, that I have never yet come across a single argument against practical Socialism that will hold water. . . . . I defy any man, of any nation, how learned, eminent, and intellectual soever, to shake the case for practical Socialism, or to refute the reasoning contained in this book."

O Shades of Socrates and Plato, succour us and keep us in countenance as we dare to look at this book with our mental eyes open! Else the mere thought of criticising will make us blush to the roots of our hair—even though more years than twelve have seen us study and brood over the difficult subjects of which it treats. You spoke not with the confidence of a Robert Blatchford; but, in your quiet, probing, large-minded way, you dealt with many who did, and we need your strengthening presence!

The book covers a wide field of social and political philosophy, and, in order to avoid superficiality in so brief an articile as this must be, we must concentrate our attention. Let us look at our author's method of handling some one point; but let that point be the most important and practical we can find. Let us go to Chapters XIII. and XIV., which raise the gravest moral questions and yet require only an appeal to facts such as all can make.

Chapter XIII. begins thus: "There are many who believe that if all the workers became abstainers, worked harder, lived sparely, and saved every penny they could, and that if they avoided early marriages and large families, they would all be happy and prosperous without Socialism.

"And, of course, these same persons believe that the bulk of the suffering and poverty of the poor is due to drink, to thriftlessness, and to imprudent marriages. . . . Now I know that belief to be wrong. . . . Sobriety, thrift, industry, skill, self-denial, holiness, are all good things; but they would, if adopted by all the workers, simply enrich the idle and the wicked, and reduce the industrious and the righteous to slavery.

"Teetotalism will not do; industry will not do; saving will not do; increased skill will not do; keeping single will not do; reducing the population will not do. Nothing will do but Socialism."

The main exposition of this thesis regarding morality and prosperity is postponed to Chapter XIV.; but by way of preparation Chapter XIII. combats the doctrine that by equal virtue men can become equally "successful." This is, of course, an easy task, for the doctrine is an obvious falsehood. But Mr. Blatchford makes his argument easier, and at the same time most unfairly suggestive, by quoting some unnamed Tory M.P. who said, "There was nothing to prevent the son of a crossing-sweeper from rising to be Lord Chancellor of England," and by putting upon these words the following strange interpretation:—"Our M.P. does not mean that there is nothing to prevent the son of some one particular crossing-sweeper from becoming Chancellor; he means that there is nothing to prevent any son of any crossing-sweeper, or the son of any very poor man, from becoming rich and famous." (P. 120.)

What must we think of the reasoning power of the man who thinks that "the son of a" is the same as "any son of any"? Could there be a more outrageous distortion of meaning? Of course, every word founded upon it is irrelevant. An elaborate arithmetical demonstration is given to show that more than one person cannot occupy the same place, and much abuse is heaped upon the straw-compounded "successful man" who denies that profound truth and who taunts the unsuccessful with their failure.

This is not the way to drive home the plea with which the chapter ends—namely, for equality of opportunity. It is the way to embitter the relations of employer and employed, and to alienate the sympathies of many who truly desire the happiness of "the workers."

Before proceeding to Chapter XIV., let us realise what consequences must follow if the argument of that chapter be accepted. The conclusion already stated is given in a new form (which I shall emphasise by italics) in the chapter itself, thus: "The proper thing is to do away with competition. At present the employers, in the scramble to undersell each other, actually fine you for your virtue and self-denial by lowering your wages. (P. 131.) Now if virtue and self-denial bring wages down as here described, what a topsy-turvy world it is, indeed! How can the wage-earner see any gospel, or even any grain of ultimate good, in the title of this chapter, "Temperance and Thrift"? If, until Socialism arrives and competition is abolished, Temperance and Thrift and other virtues must impoverish and degrade men, why should they not yield at once and without a struggle to all the vices? Or if that be impossible to moral beings, why should they not risk everything in order to end a system which offers such inducements to vice—why should they not try a revolution? For how could things be worse?

Those are the conclusions to which Mr. Blatchford's logic points, and surely a man who defies the world to refute his logic should recognise its inevitable goal. Of course, however, he does not. Or, rather, I should say, that with a patent want of logic he recognises it only to repudiate it. The paragraph which precedes the last quotation runs thus:—"But although I say that sobriety and thrift, if adopted by all the workers, would result in lower wages you are not to suppose that I advise you all to be drunkards and spendthrifts." Evidently the writer perceives that without his warning his readers would suppose what he thus briefly and coldly disclaims.

As I have already said, Mr. Blatchford's doctrine may be brought to the test by an appeal to familiar facts—economic facts. The task is, however, not so easy as might appear. Probably five-sixths of the argumentation of the world is produced in order to evade or distort facts, and the more obvious the facts the more audacious or subtle is it likely to be. The present is a case in point, so we must follow Mr. Blatchford carefully.

At the commencement of Chapter XIV. the crucial argument is opened with an air of thoroughness. Certain awkward facts are admitted (of course, they had to be, in order to come at all to grips with opponents)—namely, the facts that even under present conditions some men get higher wages than others, and that virtues sometimes have some share in causing this difference. This is a little exception to the fining for virtue and self-denial which seems to be spoken of as universal on p. 131. But the first step in sophistication is a bold proof—i.e., assertion with due air of logic—that a steady man "is only more valuable because other men are less steady," and that "if all the workers were sober and thrifty, they would all be of equal value to the employer." Over this peculiar demonstration we need not linger, for there still remains the question, in which direction do wages go in becoming equal, up or down? "Down" is, of course, Mr. Blatchford's reply, and he forthwith gives us a string of purely economic propositions arrayed with all the formalism of strictest reasoning. A few, however, will suffice to exhibit the essential framework of the argument—indeed, they will exhibit it the better, because few. The errors and subtleties which remain will be clearer, and I shall use italics, parentheses and other means to make them clearer still.

(a) There is always (in every trade?—say, in particular, the more highly specialised trades?) a large number of workers out of work.

(b) Now, under competition, where two men offer themselves for one place, you know that the place will (always, unconditionally?) be given to the man who will take the lower wage.

(c) And you know that the thrifty and the sober man can (?) live on less than the thriftless man.

(d) And all the workers being sober and thrifty, they can (?) all live on less than when many of them were wasteful and fond of drink.

(e) Then, on the other hand, all the employers are competing for the trade, and so are all wanting cheap labour; and so are eager to lower wages.

(f) Therefore wages will come down, and the general thrift and steadiness of the workers will make them poorer. (P. 128.)

This is Mr. Blatchford's final economic argument in his own words, with exceptions indicated. The following remarks must be made upon it.

1.—Some of the propositions are obviously false. For example, (b) takes no account of the increasing number of employers who know that a low wage may be false economy, and that some men are dear at any price.

2.—Some of the propositions, as used, imply wholly unwarrantable assumptions; (c) assumes that if a man can, he will live on less than another, which is by no means always the case. The man who could live up to another's standard on less than he, is often the man who refuses to live down to so low a standard. He could have the other man's pot of beer if he liked, but he wants books and a piano. In (e) it is assumed that because employers want cheap labour, and are eager, they will get it. No account is taken of the fact that the more labour they want and the more eager they are for it, the dearer will it be; and that it is the drinkers and the unthrifty who hinder wages from going up as promptly as they would, if all the employed could afford to bargain with employers, and, if necessary, to wait.

3.—Not once during the whole of this discussion of the influence of morality upon wages are Benefit Societies and Trade Unions even mentioned. Much is said about Trade Unions later on in another connection, but not here, where a reference to their power, its sources and effects, is most relevant and necessary.

4.—What is the explanation of this extraordinary blindness to facts and logical imbecility on the part of a man who is not without acuteness? He is the victim of an economic and political theory. He is so enamoured of it that it has become his one hope of the regeneration of humanity. This Socialist is committing the fatal kind of mistake with which Socialists are fond of charging Economists; and the consequences in his case threaten to be more disastrous than in any of theirs. He is dehumanising social and political philosophy. He is leaving out central human facts and trusting to a mere theory or scheme. And to a certain class of persons his mistake is the more dangerous, because his ultimate purpose is to be supremely humane. He is cutting at the roots of morality. He says in effect to the working classes: "Accept my Socialistic theory, adopt my Socialistic scheme, or—abandon virtue; for without my theory or scheme it is your ruin!" If one wished the ruin of the working classes, one could not promote it more effectually than by backing this advice. Every Socialist worthy of the nobler traditions of his creed should raise his voice against it. He knows that ideals can be realised only by the virtuous. He knows that their realisation is a work of time. Do we not all know that though a high degree of virtue is well-nigh impossible under certain conditions, yet to change even the worst conditions effectually we must foster the remaining germs of virtue? Robert Blatchford knows all this. But as I have shown, he can ignore it all for a dogma. He can play it all away for what he deems a high stake. Or ought we not to say, in kindlier-sounding words, that he thinks he has the "pearl of great price," and imagines that he may slight every other, at least for a time? However we explain the fact, here is an earnest man mortally injuring those whom he longs to serve. Let us not be angry, though we must be sorrowful, at such misdirection of power. But let us earnestly spread the light!

LABORIS AMICUS.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

THE MIDLANDS.

ON looking back to my last letter, which, I find, is ten months old, I fear the tone of it was somewhat depressing, and not calculated to give much encouragement for the work of the New Year. However, a good many things have happened since then, and the aspect of affairs in the country at large, and the Midlands in particular, has, on the whole, improved. Peace was signed in South Africa at the end of May, and the excitement and bad feeling caused by the war have happily died down. In place of these a determined though bloodless war has been waged by an ever-increasing army against the so-called Education Bill of the Government; and this war has not yet come to an end, though the Church party cannot fail to be triumphant. The matter has been passed over in silence by the Midland Christian Union, but this would have been far otherwise a few years ago. The Ministers' Meeting (Protestant Dissenting ministers of Warwickshire and neighbouring counties) passed a resolution in opposition to the Bill, but even this was not unanimous. It is truly melancholy to see our cherished principles as Nonconformists being trampled upon in the People's house, while our ministers make no protest, or, at best, but a feeble one.

I am glad to say that the vacant pulpits mentioned in my last letter are nearly all no longer vacant. As many as six congregations have made changes, an unusual number for so short a time. The Cradley congregation have chosen Rev. A. H. Shelley, who was formerly at Dudley, his place there being temporarily filled by Rev. George St. Clair. The Rev. A. H. Thomas, who lately left Manchester College, has settled at Stourbridge. Whitchurch has lost Mr. Turland, and he has gone to Walsall to succeed Mr. Dean, Mr. Turland's place having been lately taken by Rev. C. D. Badland, who is no stranger to the Midland district. West Bromwich makes up the number, and they have chosen the Rev. E. A. Voysey for their minister. The Rev. F. W. Emms was appointed to Tamworth and Atherstone at the time of my last letter, but I omitted to mention his name. The Rev. T. A. Gorton at Small Heath has now passed the stage of being a temporary minister. The new President and Treasurer of the Union were appointed at the annual meeting in March—namely, Mr. W. Byng Kenrick and Dr. J. W. Russell.

I hear the finances have been to some extent improved through the activity of the new treasurer, and I hope more will be done in this direction before next March is upon us. The energetic honorary Secretary, Mr. Charlesworth, continues to hold the office with which his name has been associated now for many years. Valuable help is also given to the work of the Union by the Rev. Rudolf Davis in his capacity of visitor. Many Sundays in the year are spent by him in going round to the churches in receipt of money from the Union, and reporting to the committee upon what he sees and hears that may be of interest. As Secretary of the Lay Preachers' Union he has also a good deal to do in arranging for laymen to conduct services when ministers are not available. In April last he took part with other Nonconformist ministers in Evesham in presenting an address of welcome to the new Bishop of Worcester when he went there for a confirmation service. This is surely evidence of a very happy state of feeling between Church and Dissent which one can only wish to see more widely extended. The Bishop was welcomed as a religious teacher, and for the religious spirit animating his published works, all theological differences being laid on one side for the moment. Will his lordship show the same generous spirit when matters affecting our rights as Nonconformists come before his notice in the House of Lords?

Wolverhampton has now a church of its own after waiting for many months. It was formally opened in September with every prospect of becoming a centre of religious and social activity at no distant time. The building is a temporary one, of pleasing appearance, and in a prominent situation close to the park, and our friends there are to be congratulated upon having their desires so far satisfied. Judging from his speech at the evening meeting their minister, Mr. Higham, is not a man to be disheartened if things should not go quite as smoothly as he would wish, and we look forward to the next two years with every hope for his success in the work he has undertaken.

I notice that Mr. Edwards, in his letter to THE INQUIRER last month, thinks that small churches should not be encouraged to have a minister of their own when they cannot hope to maintain him in a respectable position, and Mr. Hargrove, in an earlier letter, is quite convinced that there are circumstances under which a congregation may do better without a minister than with. Our friends the Quakers do without a paid ministry, and consequently have to find other means of imparting religious knowledge to their people. A few years ago they founded a Summer School Settlement with the express object of extending a knowledge of religious and social subjects among Friends, and arrangements are now being made for a "settlement" next year at a large house at Selly Oak, a few miles out of Birmingham, where lectures will be delivered and reading parties formed. It seems to me that when a new congregation is being formed, and a new church erected for their use, it is very desirable that they should be taken in charge at the first by a minister of experience, say for a year or two at the most, while they are feeling their way. By this plan the congregation would be saved during its infancy from the ill effects of inexperience and possible want of tact on the part a young minister who in other respects might be admirably equipped for his work. The young minister should acquire some knowledge and experience as assistant to an older man before taking full charge of a congregation himself.

The autumnal meeting of the Midland Christian Union was held at Stourbridge in October. I regret I was unable to be present, especially after reading the paper read on that occasion by the Rev. Rudolf Davis on the "The Organising Idea of our Churches" appearing in THE INQUIRER a fortnight ago. The gist of his argument is that our churches exist because they hold certain theological beliefs different from those of other churches; in fact, our churches stand for Unitarianism. The free seeking of truth is not the life of our churches, but rather the atmosphere in which such life is lived; it exists, as it were, to preserve the health of belief. Freedom to seek the truth does not nourish the religious life. It is the result of the search that supports the life, not the search.

It amounts to this, that we Unitarians have our own creed which is a progressive creed and subject to change as new truths are brought to light, but giving support to our churches "neither involves nor requires subscription to any articles of theological belief," as one of our principal Midland churches expresses it. I hear that Mr. Davis's paper aroused a warm discussion with speeches on both sides of the question. The idea of our churches being in any sense sectarian is repugnant to many of us, and a suggestion to call our Union by the name of Midland Unitarian Association, made a few years ago, was scouted with a sort of horror, though if looked at from an outsider's point of view, it is a title which more correctly characterises that society than any other. We pride ourselves upon being more liberal than any of the sects in our religious beliefs, but others do not regard us in the same light. I have heard a "Friend" claim superiority in this respect for his own religion, the reason given being that Unitarians were wanting in Evangelicalism and all that the word implies, thereby suggesting that their religion was limited in its range. He might as well have complained that we were not Trinitarians. But this all helps to illustrate the position taken by Mr. Davis in his paper, and, much as some of us may dislike it and disagree with it, it has to me every appearance of being the true one.

While writing of the Midlands I cannot pass over an event of importance which will affect a much wider area than this district or even this country; I mean the publication of the first number of the Hibbert Journal in October last. The editor, the Rev. L. P. Jacks, has spared no pains to make it in every way worthy to hold a leading place in our periodical literature. It is a quarterly review of religion, theology and philosophy.

I take the following from the editorial introduction:—

> It opens its pages to the thought which lives and moves. It offers to religious thought a genuinely open field. Its mission is to represent thought which advances, not defining the direction the movement ought to take, whether as a return to old positions or as a departure for new. Controversy will be welcomed.

I hear the circulation of the first number has been very satisfactory, and its success must be very gratifying to the editor and those associated with him in the new venture.

One other interesting event I wish to record before closing this letter. The Ministers' Benevolent Society has recently completed its fifty years of work. It originated in Birmingham in October, 1852, and its capital in the first year was just over £2,400. Its operations are still directed from Birmingham, and its capital now is just over £65,400. The income from this fund is administered in a quiet unostentatious manner, doing incalculable good to many who richly deserve help and who would otherwise suffer great hardships.

As a Birmingham Unitarian I am much interested to learn that the London Association intend to celebrate the centenary of Dr. Priestley's death in 1904 by bringout a new edition of his life. I think there is certainly room for such a work, and I shall be very glad to see the intention carried into effect. H.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

CHRISTMAS APPEALS.

London: Deptford.—The Rev. A. J. Marchant writes:—"May I be allowed to make my annual appeal in aid of my Poor's Purse? The help obtained at this season has to meet the demands of the year, and, with the prospect of a severe winter, the prevalence of sickness amongst young and old, and the scarcity of employment, the claims are likely to be exceptionally heavy." Contributions of money, clothing, toys, &c., will be thankfully received by the Rev. A. J. Marchant, 37, Clifton-road, Peckham, London, S.E.

London: Mansford-street.—The Rev. John Ellis writes again to enforce the urgency of his appeal, published a fortnight ago, and to ask that in addition to money (of which his work is still greatly in need), coal tickets, letters for the Adelaide Dispensary, Surgical Aid Society, Ophthalmic Hospital, and Convalescent Homes may also be sent.

Acton.—At a successful social meeting held on Saturday last, it was unanimously decided "That the first anniversary, which takes place on Jan. 25 next, should be celebrated in a suitable manner." On that day two services will be held, when it is hoped that a leading London minister and the Rev. J. H. Wicksteed will be the preachers. It was also arranged to hold a social meeting about the same date. The Rev. J. H. Wicksteed is now delivering a course of sermons on "Natural Christianity." Last Sunday the subject was, "Was the Coming of Christ Prophesied?" Next Sunday it is "The Birth of Jesus. Was it a Miracle?"

Bridport.—Last Saturday was the birthday anniversary of Miss Harriet Crabb, Superintendent of the Girls' Sunday-school, who then attained the age of ninety-two. Some time ago Miss Crabb had a severe illness, but since recovering she has seemed each year to grow younger, and is now an active walker, quick in her sight, and possessed of an invaluable influence for good in the Sunday-school, which she never fails to attend, morning and afternoon. She was five years old when she first became a scholar, and she has continued as scholar, teacher, and superintendent without break until the present time, thus establishing a record of eighty-seven years. Her portrait is now being painted by two of the students at the Art School, and her many friends cherish the hope that her living presence may yet remain amongst them for some years to come.

Boston.—Last Sunday Mr. W. H. Shrubsole, F.G.S., gave a most interesting address in Spain-lane Chapel on "Religious Thought in Hungary, Past and Present," and on Monday he gave his lecture on "Holiday Rambles in Hungary," which delighted the very intelligent audience that were present. The Mayor presided, and it was under the patronage of most of the public men of the town.

Leeds : Mill-hill.—The Chapel Record, noting the appointment of Mr. Ward as Lord Mayor, remarks that this is the seventeenth time, since the passing of the Municipal Corporations Acts, that a member of the congregation has been elected Chief Magistrate. A course of public week-evening lectures, by the Rev. Charles Hargrove, on "The Gospel of John," has been attended on an average by 230 people, and has proved a most gratifying and unexpected success. The 230th anniversary of Mill-hill Chapel is to be celebrated on the last Sunday of the year.

London : Essex Church.—To-morrow(Sunday), at the evening service, "The Messiah" will be sung by an augmented choir, assisted by Mme. Carrie Blackwell, Miss Minnie Chamberlain, Mr. W. Jefferson, and Mr. Albert Norcroft.

London : Forest Gate.—The winter activities have been successfully carried on at Upton-lane so far, though "East is East" in a very real sense this year. Mr. Perris's discourses on "Dante," with their outlook upon Mediævalism and Modern Faith, have excited much interest and largely increased the evening congregations. The meetings of the Literary and Social Union have also been unusually well attended—the Shakespeare studies in particular.

London : Stamford-street.—A conference of Band of Hope workers was held on Saturday evening, Dec. 6, under the auspices of the National Unitarian Temperance Association. A large number was present. Tea and coffee were provided by the ladies of the Stamford-street congregation. The conference opened at six o'clock ; the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie presided. A short programme of music was arranged, but the principal attraction was an address given by Mr. Charles Wakely, Secretary to the U.K.B. of H.U. His speech was intensely practical and full of interest. There were for the Temperance worker, he said, three main lines of work—education, organisation, and legislation. Those present had little to do with the last. The people to-day were the boys and girls of yesterday ; the boys and girls of to-day will one day blossom into public opinion ; their work in teaching the children was therefore of vast importance. Speaking to the second point—organisation—Mr. Wakely gave many valuable hints on the management of a successful Band of Hope. The worker should be a total abstainer. Cheerfulness in every detail was a sine qua non ; especially in the hymns, "Rescue the perishing" being very unsuitable. The joyousness of the child should be well studied and reflected. The pictures, too, by being bright and cheerful, might compensate the child at times for a poor speech. Things seen are better than things heard. Order and discipline were best maintained by perfect pre-arrangement ; everything should be arranged in order, and the programme rigidly adhered to, even in the time of dismissal. Instruction to children, like food for lambs, should be given little at a time, often and warm. Mr. Wakely spoke with great skill on the difficulties to be contended against, and concluded his speech with an appeal to his hearers not to lose sight of the ideal Band of Hope, which was not mine nor yours, but ours. The Rev. W. C. Bowie, after thanking Mr. Wakely for his speech, so full of practical wisdom, and replete with large experience, ably directed the conference, and by calling on one speaker after another drew from the meeting many very interesting speeches. Mrs. Tarrant, the Rev. F. Allen, Messrs. Bredall, Noel, Cowlin, Titford, Harris, Biggs, and Ritchie (secretary Lambeth Band of Hope Union) being the speakers. During the evening the Stamford-street B. of H. and M. Choir rendered two melodies, Mrs. W. R. Marshall and Miss Bredall contributed songs, while Mr. Waddington performed two violin solos. Votes of thanks were accorded to all who had assisted in providing such a profitable and enjoyable evening.

Macclesfield.—The congregation of the King Edward-street Chapel has suffered a severe loss in the death of Mr. Sidney Smith, which occurred on Dec. 4. Mr. Smith, who was sixty years of age, had been from earliest childhood connected with the congregation, and last year succeeded the late Francis Greg as chairman. He was a successful manufacturer, and took a great interest in local affairs, being prominently connected with the Liberal Association. The attendance at the funeral on Monday, when a sympathetic address was delivered by the Rev. W. G. Cadman, showed in what high regard Mr. Smith was held.

Manchester : Bradford.—On Sunday evening, Dec. 7, a lantern service was held in the Mill-street Free Church, the subject being scenes from "The Life of Jesus." The Rev. W. E. Atack gave a very interesting and instructing short address, and two songs, "The Holy City" and "Nazareth," were sung. There was a fair congregation.

Manchester : Chorlton-cum-Hardy. — On Sunday last the Rev. J. Ruddle, preaching to young people on "The Coming Christmas," made an appeal on behalf of the Willert-street Mission. "Last Monday the missionary there (the Rev. J. W. Bishop) told us he had the names of five hundred children on his Sunday-school books. He felt sure he could have as many as a thousand if he had room for them. But the rooms are crowded with the children who now attend. About seventy little girls are under six years ; then there will be nearly as many little boys, some a little older, some nearly grown into young women and men. All these are poor. Many are so poor that they are smaller and weaker than they ought to be, for lack of the right kind of food and wholesome fresh air. Sometimes a girl so young that she ought to be at school works to keep herself and partly keep her mother, who is weak and earns little. . . . At the very best they need more friends than they have, more cheery words, more kind help, more good will. We have only a tiny Sunday-school here ; but if each one could do some little thing to make glad one who has but little gladness, it would be a very Christmas-like thing to do. If like the wise men we could go and see some bonny babe, leave a present, with good wishes, and then come away, that would be best. The next best would surely be to send a good deed and a good word where they are so much needed and would be so greatly appreciated."

Manchester District Association.—Members of the Governing Body paid a visit to Heaton Moor Free Church on Saturday last, and were supported by representatives from ten or eleven of the associated churches. Service was held at 3.30, conducted by the Rev. H. K. White, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. E. P. Barrow. In the evening a meeting, presided over by Mr. A. E. Piggott, was held, and speeches were delivered by Mr. Richard Robinson, Mr. William Simpson, and the Rev. Priestley Prime. Music was provided by the choir and friends. The visit was made on the invitation of the Heaton Moor friends, under the scheme for extending the usefulness of the Association.

Nottingham : Hyson Green.—An American Fair, in connection with the Sunday-school, was held on Saturday, Dec. 5. In order to keep down the expenditure, the senior boys collected the goods, and some of the teachers and scholars distributed the handbills. The parents and scholars at the Mission did their best, and rummaged out of their cupboards and wardrobes a nice collection of second-hand clothing, &c. ; and a few friends from the Pavement and Christ Church generously responded to the appeal for contributions, so that the room presented the appearance of a curiosity shop. A crowd at the door before opening-time quickly proved the popularity of these sales, and most of the bargains were very speedily disposed of.

Preston.—On Sunday evening last the Rev. N. Anderton, B.A., gave the concluding address of a series on "Five Poetical Dramas." The course has included "Samson Agonistes," "Prometheus Unbound," "Cain," "Pippa Passes," and "Maud." A previous course was delivered on "Founders of World Religions," the subjects being "Confucius," "Buddha," "Christ," and "Mahommed."

Richmond (Appointment).—Mr. T. J. Hardy, B.A., who has acted for some time as secretary to the Free Church, taking an active part in its work, has accepted an appointment as assistant to the Rev. Silas Farrington in the ministry of the church. Mr. Hardy, we are glad to think, is already well known to our readers, by his contributions to these columns, his pamphlet on "The Nation's Peril," and his little book, "A Confession of Heresy and a Plea for Frankness." He may be assured of a most cordial welcome into the ranks of our ministry.

Sale.—The Rev. W. L. Schroeder, M.A., has just completed the course of lectures in the Unitarian Church on "Comparative Religion." The last two lectures given on Sunday evenings, Nov. 23 and Nov. 30, dealt with "Confucianism" and "Mahommedanism" respectively. Both lectures were exceedingly well attended, and the whole course has given the congregation good hopes of future well doing. On Sunday evening, Dec. 7, Mr. Schroeder delivered a lecture upon "Social Morality and Municipal Control" ; this lecture was very well attended.

Sheffield : Upperthorpe.—A grand bazaar was held in Channing Hall on Dec. 3 and 4, to raise funds to meet the expenses of renovating the chapel. It was opened on the first day by the Master Cutler (Mr. A. J. Hobson), and on the second by Mr. J. B. Wostinholm, in the absence of Miss Matthews who was prevented by ill-health from being present. The total receipts are expected to produce the sum of £425. At the close of the bazaar Mrs. W. R. Stevenson was presented with a handsome table centre as a slight recognition on the part of the workers of her valuable services. The Rev. A. H. Dolphin made the presentation. It is hoped that the amount secured will be sufficient to carry out the object of the promoters.

Teeside Committee.—This committee of the N. and D.U.A. made a new departure at its bi-monthly meeting at Middlesbrough on Dec. 8, when, after the ordinary business, a conference was held, with the object of adding to the general interest of the occasion. A paper was read by the Rev. Henry Cross suggesting that a church magazine (gratis) should be jointly circulated by the churches of Stockton, Middlesbrough, and Darlington. The suggestion was favourably received, but practical difficulties seemed to stand in the way.

Whitchurch.—The congregation of the Church of the Saviour have received, through the kindness of the Wood Green congregation, a large number of copies of the "Essex Hall Hymnal," and from the High-street Church, Shrewsbury, some handsome gas-fittings for the church, fixed, free of cost, by Mr. Wyatt.

GENERAL BAPTIST CHAPEL, NOTTAGE, GLAMORGAN.

Some months ago an Appeal was made for Funds to Renovate the above place of worship, and to make some structural alterations in the School-room; a sum of about £40 being considered necessary for doing the work. The Chapel has been Renovated, and presents a very pleasing appearance; but we have not enough in hand to warrant our proceeding with the work needed to the School-room. Any help will be most thankfully received by Rev. W. J. PHILLIPS, Newton, Porthcawl, R.S.O.; or Mr. W. J. WILLIAMS, Royal Oak, Porthcawl, R.S.O.

A BOOK TO BE BOUGHT.

THE LIFE AND LETTERS OF JAMES MARTINEAU.

By the Rev. JAMES DRUMMOND, Principal of Manchester College, Oxford, and the Rev. C. B. UPTON.

In Two Large Volumes (with several Portraits and Illustrations), Demy 8vo, 30s. net.

PRESS OPINIONS.

"The two volumes of 'The Life and Letters of Dr. Martineau,' which we owe to his friends Principal Drummond and Professor Upton, will be prized by all who knew or admired one of the great ethical teachers and one of the purest and noblest figures of our time."—TIMES.

"These volumes intensify, if possible, our admiration for Dr. Martineau's great intellectual powers, his rare skill as a dialectician, his splendid faculty for exposition; but, above all, for a rare sweetness and graciousness of spirit and for a profound insight into the things that matter—those things that transcend time and space, and alone give to human life stability and sanctity."—WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

"A worthy representation of one of the most impressive and gracious figures of the century just closed."—SCOTSMAN.

"The book is one of the most remarkable contributions to biographical literature published within recent years."—DUNDEE COURIER.

"We rejoice to think that it had fallen into such good hands to satisfy the need, and that their mission here has been so fully and so satisfyingly accomplished."—CHRISTIAN WORLD.

"We receive these volumes as a very precious gift. No other book published in our time can affect us quite as this does."—THE INQUIRER.

SELECTIONS FROM

THE OCCASIONAL SERMONS AND ADDRESSES OF

JOHN HAMILTON THOM.

EDITED WITH A MEMOIR BY

V. D. DAVIS, B.A.

Crown 8vo, 224 pp. A Companion Volume to "Christ the Revealer."

"A brief and well-written biography is followed by extracts from sermons and addresses, three complete discourses, and an address to students. The book appeals naturally, in the first place, to those who share Mr. Thom's conceptions of a liberal, undogmatic Christianity, but there is much to interest any serious thinker."—MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.

"Selections, pertinent and illuminating, from the sermons and addresses of Mr. Thom, the broad-minded Unitarian minister, and friend of Dr. Martineau. Mr. Davis's memoir is a good example of description and selection in a small space."—BOOKMAN.

"The book will be made most welcome by those who know the two volumes of 'Laws of Life after the Mind of Christ,' and it may do more than even those volumes to keep this good man's influence alive."—EXPOSITORY TIMES.

"There is much helpful thought in these selections, presented with clearness and force, and calculated to be of value to earnest minds and of especial use to those who are engaged in public ministry. There is a directness in J. H. Thom's treatment of his subjects, both as regards the duties of the ministry and the congregation, which is at once suggestive and inspiring, and which must appeal to men of sincere purpose, whether their views be considered orthodox or heterodox."—BRITISH FRIEND.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

As Christmas Day falls on Thursday next week, it will be necessary to print and despatch THE INQUIRER on Christmas Eve. That will be our last issue for the present year, and will contain the usual Retrospect, and also some notes as to the New Year. Communications for that number should reach the office by Monday, if possible, and on Tuesday morning at latest. To all friends, near and distant, the heartiest of Christmas good wishes!

TO-MORROW is Peace Sunday, happily assigned in many churches as the natural prelude to Christmas, to a special consideration and advocacy of the great principles which make for conciliation and amity between the nations of the earth, in the spirit of the angels' song of "Peace on earth and good-will." This year, with no light-hearted confidence, and yet with thankfulness and a better hope for the future, the sincere Christian preacher may speak his word.

THE closing stages of the Parliamentary discussion of the Education Bill have been marked by incidents which do not tend in any way to lessen the dissatisfaction evoked earlier. The House of Lords have added an amendment to prevent, if possible, the unsectarian character of secondary schools and colleges; they have endeavoured to secure the "rights" of the bishop against the force of the Kenyon-Slaney clause; and, to crown all, they have defied the long-cherished "privilege" of the House of Commons as the sole initiator of measures affecting taxation by passing an amendment relieving the denominational trustees of the cost of making good "wear and tear" connected with the use of their buildings for school purposes. By an ingenious device which, however, must strike everyone as childish and ridiculous, the Government escaped the outcry otherwise rendered inevitable by this financial proposition of the Lords. The proviso was added to it at the last moment that no financial burden should, in consequence of the amendment, be laid upon public funds; but this made sheer nonsense of the clause, as Mr. Balfour candidly confessed. Of course, the proviso was only put in to be struck out by the Commons, and thus leave the original amendment unimpaired, a piece of politics worthy of "Alice in Wonderland."

THE Bill will be finally passed by the time these lines are read, and Mr. Balfour may go to his holidays with as much satisfaction as a philosophic mind can extract from the situation. On the one hand, extreme ritualists declare that the denominational schools are to be denominational no longer, and that religious instruction is really taken out of the sole charge of the clergyman of the parish. On the other hand, the Nonconformists are organising their forces, partly to defeat the new Act through the difficulties of the rate-collector, partly, and it must be thought, more wisely, to extract from it all the benefits possible. To the general body of citizens, who seek no sectarian ends, the new Act suggests some few possibilities for good, amid a puzzling tangle that no one professes to be able at present to unravel; but the one thing certain is that somebody is getting a good bargain out of it, and that we had better all go through the figures carefully again and see what the Church really is to give for all it gets out of the public funds. By the time the London Bill comes on we ought to know.

THE London District Unitarian Society, with the appointment of the Rev. J. H. Wicksteed as their District Minister, have entered upon a vigorous effort to strengthen the churches and extend the influence of Unitarianism in the metropolis. To this end a monthly London Unitarian Letter is being issued (a single folded sheet), which in addition to a list of churches, and news notes, publishes a letter from Mr. Wicksteed to "London Friends." The December letter acknowledges the cordial welcome which Mr. Wicksteed has received from the churches, and notes with satisfaction the signs of faith and activity which he has found in them. To the question, why there is such great need for a District Minister in London, Mr. Wicksteed makes the following reply:—

> Certainly not because London ministers are behind others in zeal and enterprise. This would make such a post one of despair. On the contrary, only one thing has more deeply impressed me than the sterling worth of the work being done in all parts of London. And that one thing is the isolation of almost every one of our congregations. Here are thirty kindred churches, gathering every Sunday many hundreds of people for worship, and influencing the lives, more or less deeply, of a far larger number. Yet instead of each one feeling that it is a small part of an important metropolitan movement, significant even numerically compared with many younger causes, and with a future before it of illimitable possibilities, many of our churches seem to think of themselves as little oases barely rescued from a desert of almost unrelieved indifference, hostility or failure. But, indeed, it is no such matter—and if only we knew a little more of the fine quality of work being done in almost every quarter of London, and the special successfulness of many of our suburban movements, we should, I believe, work on with much better heart and much better success than ever. And the first purpose, therefore, of the London Unitarian Letter and of myself as District Minister is to help you to realise and to rejoice in one another.

THE fourth annual meeting of the Garden City Association was held at Essex Hall on Tuesday evening, Mr. Ralph Neville, K.C., in the chair. He announced that the whole of the £20,000 capital for the first company had now been subscribed, and they were about to set an object-lesson before the country which would be of the highest value as affecting the great evil of congested populations. Mr. Ebenezer Howard was one of the subsequent speakers, and advocated the limiting of the company's dividend to 5 per cent. Another speaker referred to Bournville and Port Sunlight as splendid examples of what individual enterprise could do.

THE second and third lectures of the Bishop of Worcester on "The Historical Trustworthiness of the Gospels" are disappointing. The interest which they promised centred in the problem how, after conceding the critical method and the secondary character of Matthew and Luke, Dr. Gore would contrive to reach his predetermined goal. The solution turns out to be, partly by bold assertion, partly by an imputation of partisan bias to the more liberal critics, partly by claiming for himself a special measure of spiritual capacity. There is, indeed, some attempt at argument, some of which is wasted on questions which are not at issue. Of that which is relevant, here is a specimen. After citing the Pauline summary of the Resurrection, the Bishop proceeded :—

Well, that summary was continually in the minds of the Churches; continually repeated—a sort of primary creed, a basis of the faith. When you turn to the Gospels you find that the records of the Resurrection are extraordinarily casual and unmethodical, and at first sight we may say that they arose in that casual and unmethodical way, and that later ages methodised them and brought them into order. But exactly the opposite is true. The Gospels were not used for this dogmatic purpose. The method was there, the definite, and, as it were, the dogmatic, formulated summary was there from the very first decades of the life of the Church, as was seen in the indisputable evidence of St. Paul's Epistle. But the Gospels were used as records. They were the witnesses of individuals as to what they had seen—excellent witnesses of individuals—and the subsequent mind, for the sake of being precise in the record, was not allowed to go back upon the original statement.

If this paragraph had formed part of an argument against the literal truth of the Gospel narratives, and in favour of the Pauline or spiritual view of the Resurrection, it need not have caused any surprise; but as an argument for the historical trustworthiness of the Gospels it is certainly surprising.

CONCERNING the miracles recorded in Mark, Dr. Gore says, "I ask you to observe how interwoven they are with the sayings of our Lord, and how they are stamped as indisputably authentic." If to ask your audience to observe a thing establishes that thing, then the authenticity of the miracles in the second Gospel is established. Taking Dr. Cheyne as a dreadful example of Higher Criticism, the Bishop discerns in him "a temper of a kind unwilling to accept the evidence, to which evidence was not allowed to appeal, simply because of an antecedent determination that the thing could not have taken place." Dr. Cheyne, speaking of the miracle of the fig-tree as a parable misunderstood, had observed that the writer forgot that the Passover was not the time of figs. This remark seems to Dr. Gore to have "required extraordinary courage . . . seeing that St. John, in the immediate connection of the narrative, says 'The time of figs was not yet.'" What date, we wonder, does the Bishop assign to the Fourth Gospel? Dr. Gore seems, however, to have become conscious of his inability to sustain the part of critic, for he suddenly abandons the rôle. "The matter does not lie," he says, "in the evidence only, but in something else—the antecedent sense of what is probable." A great deal, he adds, will depend upon our inner state of mind. His lordship next spoke about the inequality of spiritual capacity. He could not believe that if Christ was what Christians believed him to have been he could have failed to work miracles. So, after all that proem about "regarding the documents purely from a historical point of view," we come to this, that the miracles depend on our dogmatic preconceptions, and they again on our spiritual capacity. The third lecture comes to an appropriate conclusion with the old dilemma, Aut deus aut mendax, the most uncritical dictum that could easily be found.

MRS. HUMPHRY WARD was unfortunately prevented by illness from giving her promised address on "Church Membership" at a meeting of the Churchmen's Union for the advancement of Liberal Religious Thought on Wednesday afternoon, and in her much regretted absence the Rev. Dr. Morrison, Chairman of the Council, gave a very lucid and earnest address on the principles and purpose of the Union. Faith, he said, must rest on the solid ground of Christian experience, and religious truth required restatement in the light of modern knowledge. High Church doctrine, which was a revival of mediæval conceptions, could not satisfy, nor Low Church doctrine, which was a survival from the seventeenth century and Puritanism. At the same time, he agreed with the late Professor Sabatier that the ancient symbols could not yet be abandoned. They were useful for teaching purposes, when rightly interpreted. Professor Henslow was in the chair.

AN interesting article on "Charles Dickens's Religion" appeared in the Spectator of Dec. 6, with ample evidence of the breadth of the great novelist's religious sympathies. "Dickens," the writer of the article says, "possibly, was not what would be called a decidedly 'religious' man."

He may not have had a passion for Church services and sermons, he may have had no great liking for the Athanasian Creed as a thing to be said by simple yokels or chanted by little boys in surplices, but religion was for him a very real thing. He had a creed that might be called a useful and a "working" creed, a handy thing for a man of so busy and so strenuous a life.

The writer might have been more definite, for Dickens, while holding very earnestly to his Christian faith, was decidedly unorthodox, and, in fact, was in middle life a member of the Unitarian congregation to which the Rev. Edward Tagart (who died in 1858) ministered. Near the end of his life Dickens wrote to one of his sons, who was going up to Cambridge, with much excellent practical advice, and then added the following sentences (quoted in the Spectator article) :—

As your brothers have gone away one by one I have written to each of them what I am now going to write to you. You know that you have never been hampered with religious forms of restraint, and that with mere unmeaning forms I have no sympathy. But I must strongly and affectionately impress upon you the priceless value of the New Testament, and the study of that book as the one unfailing guide in life. Deeply respecting it, and bowing down before the character of our Saviour, as separated from the vain constructions and inventions of men, you cannot go very wrong, and will always preserve at heart a true spirit of veneration and humility. Similarly I impress upon you the habit of saying a Christian prayer every night and morning. These things have stood by me all through my life, and remember that I tried to render the New Testament intelligible to you and lovable by you when you were a mere baby.

The manuscript, in which Dickens wrote out for his children the simple Gospel story, still exists, but never will be published, as the writer says, so long as the wishes of its compiler are respected.

A FRIENDLY interest in so great and influential a people as the Wesleyans would of itself cause us to look forward with something more than curiosity, with expectancy and hope to the new hymn-book now in active preparation for the use of "the people called (Wesleyan) Methodists." A statement in the Methodist Times, however, sets us wondering what the congregations will be expected to sing. "One or two hymns have been accepted from other books which will make the higher critics gnash their teeth, but their popular use, or their simple statement of Gospel truth, carried them in." Had the statement been that a critic's teeth would be set on edge, we might have expected to see an old friend or two from Tate and Brady; but as the statement stands we can only imagine that "Jonah's adventure in the whale," or the Mosaic authorship of the Book of Leviticus, or the genuineness of the Second Epistle of Peter is to form the subject of a good Gospel song written in eight and six. Seriously, however, the argumentative hymn is exactly the hymn that is likely to be dropped, and will be missed without being regretted. In olden days Unitarians and Trinitarians, believers in God's sovereign choice and believers in his "undistinguishing regard," sang at each other in their devotions, as well as preached at each other in tracts and sermons. They do so now but rarely and accidentally, when some concise exposition of doctrine that used to pass for a hymn happens to be retained for old acquaintance sake. Generally people are glad to forget their disputes, theological as well as political, while they sing, and if the new book should contain a hymn by Dr. Clifford it will almost certainly be a hymn that it would do Mr. Balfour good to sing. We are therefore sceptical about this prophecy of gnashing of teeth, and think that the higher critics will probably raise their voices not to protest, but to sing with the others.

THE Indian Messenger of Nov. 23 refers with sorrow to the death of Sir John Woodburn, Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal. During the four years of his tenure of that office Sir John had completely won the confidence of the people, for whom he manifested the sincerest sympathy.

He took earnest interest in every philanthropical enterprise, however small or unassuming. Sir John Woodburn never ridiculed or showed haughty disregard towards the legitimate hopes and aspirations of the people. With their attempts of social and educational progress he deeply sympathised. In the spread of female education in particular he was deeply interested. The Brahmo Samaj is deeply grateful to him for the kind and genuine interest he took in the Brahmo Girls' School, which institution loses in him a warm friend, patron and a more than official supporter. Some of his most sympathetic speeches were made in the prize-distribution meetings of the Brahmo Girls' School, Bethune College and Mahakali Pathsala. It is, therefore, quite natural that a wave of deep spontaneous grief has swept over the entire province. Sir John Woodburn is the first Lieutenant-Governor to die in his office, and the sorrow at his death is deep, real and universal.

LITERATURE.

GLIMPSES OF TENNYSON.*

ATTENTIVE readers of the biography of Tennyson, by his son, will probably recall a sketch of the poet's life at Farringford, originally contributed by Miss Maud Weld to another biography, and included among the numerous appendices to the former work. This lady has now published a small but truly valuable book, enlarging the picture she gave then, and adding many interesting facts concerning the Tennysons and their friends. There could be little, indeed, in her book to surprise one; but she has done well to leave on record the impressions of so privileged a witness. The Sellwood sisters were three; Alfred Tennyson married the eldest, Charles Tennyson (afterwards Tennyson-Turner) married the youngest; and Miss Weld, the daughter of the middle sister, thus had two poets for her uncles. Her father was the historian of the Royal Society. The Maud and Bertram Tennyson, who supply the appendix, were children of Horatio, the youngest brother of the laureate.

Thankful as all lovers of English literature must be for any material that helps to body forth the living semblance of so great a writer, it may be taken for granted that the first chapter of this little book, dealing with the families of Tennyson and Sellwood, will be read with interest. It has little, however, to do with him directly, and we hasten to those chapters that have more. These, we find, relate almost wholly to the poet's life in the Isle of Wight, where the Welds were for years his neighbours. A few lines, hitherto unpublished, are reproduced in facsimile. The most striking of them are these—

> But some high-thoughted moods and moulds of mind
> Can never be remodelled or expressed
> Again by any later century.

Jostling high-thoughted relics like these are homelier, but not less welcome, human touches—fragments of conversation and correspondence, and personal reminiscences such as the poet's enthusiasm for "plain boiled salt beef," which, however, may have been kindly exaggerated in order to save trouble to his hostess. "Write a kind letter to the poor beast," he said, respecting a poor young German poet who threatened suicide if he did not get a reply from Tennyson. "Poor beast" was a favourite expression of compassion with him, we are told. He loved trees, and grieved when the axe smote them, especially if in summertime. "Uncle Charles" let the stakes of willow sprout and grow into trees, slaying the rose bushes they were meant to prop. Tennyson not only sang of plants and flowers, but on occasion could carve them. The present volume is adorned with many interesting portraits, but also with ivy leaves on the cover, copied from mouldings of the poet's own design. If at times he seemed brusque in speech it was attributable, we learn, to his strict desire to say truth before all things; on the other hand, he always put the best construction on people's words and actions. O si sic nos omnes, poets, preachers, politicians, or plain men in the street as we may be!

In the third chapter some valuable fragments are given from notes by the late Mrs. Richard Ward, daughter of Sir John Simeon, Tennyson's intimate friend, and incidentally we get a peep into the little old study at the top of the house at Farringford (before the fine study was built)—a little old study, with rows of shelves round three sides, three tables, sofa, and two or three chairs—and with swarms of busy bees, "nice fat bees," flying in and out of the window. We see the great poet taking a shy, wondering maiden for a walk on the Down, amazing her with all he knew, and quenching all her fear of him in reverence. New testimony is given to the delight of Tennyson and Browning in each other's genius. As to that peerage which troubled some worthy people, Tennyson, it appears, solemnly charged Miss Weld to let all the world know "'how great a sacrifice' (these were his very words)" he had practised in yielding to Mr. Gladstone's pressing entreaties that he should take it. Again, we find Tennyson, like Samuel Johnson, deeply interested in ghosts, who, however, seem never to have stood their ground against his strict cross-examination of the evidence. Such are some of the bits of realism that in a few years people will value perhaps more than the most interested of us now. What would the world not give for a handful of similar odds and ends about Shakespeare had but Judith thought it worth her while to make a little book on what she knew?

The last chapter in this all-too-brief gossip (may we call it?) deals with Tennyson's character and conversation, and here the serious student will find something to ponder, perhaps something to estimate critically. Affectionate, true, earnest, a "believer"—in the broad sense—we knew Tennyson to be. These pages bring him to us as he would speak to young hearts like that of his niece, who writes with an emotion which may be trusted wholly as veracious, however the careful reader may feel compelled to ask himself whether Jowett, for instance, would present exactly such a picture of the poet's theology. Of course he was to the last, as from the first, a son of the Church, and one can well understand the anxiety of a pious affection to secure his memory against inferences prejudicial to his reputation for orthodoxy which might be raised from certain large expressions he has used. But as this book is not the book to deal wholly and satisfactorily with the wide subject of Tennyson's religion, so this brief notice is not the place to criticise that aspect of it. We cannot close better than by quoting a few sentences which describe how the poet regarded his own life-duty.

> He told me (says Miss Weld) that his sense of the divine source of this gift was almost awful to him, since he felt that every word of his should be consecrated to the service of Him who had touched his lips with that fire of Heaven which was to enable him to speak in God's name to his age. So that, great as was the delight he felt in the exercise of his art, the constant realisation of his responsibility so far outweighed to him the joy of production that he was wont to say to me that nothing he had ever written seemed to him to have reached the perfection short of which he must never rest, and that all he could hope for was that he had brought man a little nearer to God; for as he sat day by day at the Master's feet with that humility of childhood which he kept to his dying hour, he felt no words of his could ever fully reproduce the message which had been spoken to his own heart, and yet that he must strive with all his might to clothe them in the best language he could find. And so he sang on all through that long life of his, not that he might receive the homage of his own or future ages as a consummate artist, but as one to whom, all unworthy though he deemed himself, the mission had been entrusted of raising the thoughts of all who should come under his influence to a higher, diviner level—the level to which he himself was ever aspiring.

LOVE AND LIFE.*

WHAT first strikes one in this little book are the reproductions, beautiful, in spite of the smallness of the scale, of six of the best known of Mr. Watts's pictures, in photogravure from photographs by Mr. F. Hollyer. These will account for the price of this little book of less than a hundred pages.

The book itself is a series of dream-pictures, hinting at the profounder spiritual meanings of life, the work of an idealist with poetic imagination, and yet with a very definite hold upon the reality of life as it now is. This is particularly seen in the bold treatment of a difficult subject in the fifth chapter on "Promises." A note at the beginning of the book disclaims any intention of offering an interpretation of Watts's pictures; the short pieces it contains are "an expression of thoughts suggested, in most cases, by the pictures."

Thus in the first chapter, on "Love and Life," we are shown Life as a woman, kindled by the ideal, leaving the lower plain to climb the rugged mountain for Love's sake, and finding, when Love has come to help her in the steep ascent, that the vision of beauty grows more and more wonderful. The following passage will show better than any description the the character of the book:—

> Now, as they mounted higher, they spoke little, for sympathy on the heights is so strengthened, and purified, that each understood; and the silence was far, far sweeter than any words. And on Life's face was a beautiful, joyous light, and she stumbled but seldom now, only her eyes looked ever into Love's with a great knowledge and trust, and Love led her on.
> And one lovely, holy morning, Life saw but one peak before them, and its summit was bathed in a glorious light from the other side; and the light was reflected by an altar on the summit, and its rays fell down over the path Love and Life were ascending and made it beautiful. And Life said—
> "Where is the darkness that men call Death?" And Love answered—"This is the peak of death." And Love looked into Life's eyes, and from their depths her eyes smiled back into his—for Love had revealed the immortality of love, and she knew they would never part.
> And Life looked around her, and she saw that the light from beyond death could not reach on to the plains, for the mountains of death are high and steep, and men at the foot are too close to the blackness and overhanging crags to see the light from the other side. And Love pointed to the altars on the topmost peak of death, and he said—

"These are the altars lit by love and the spirit of Truth, and their light is always burning. If men will lift their eyes, they will see the light, and it will lead them by a sunny and beauteous path to death and the great beyond. But when, in their eager race for the things of sense, they will not pause to look upwards, death appears to them black and horrible. For all paths lead past death, and only when reflected by love can the light from the altars of the Everlasting reach man."

And Love clasped Life's hand more closely and led her up the shining slope.

In the second chapter on "Love and Death" the dream is different. There are two pictures, very tenderly drawn, of death, and the great secret at its heart. In the second Love is the man, and his beloved is passing away. They both feel that death is near, but he makes her understand how love takes away all fear. Then she is satisfied, knowing that Love alone is real.

And Love gently stooped and kissed the broad high brow, and he said—

"For thee indeed the bitterness of Death is passed."

And as he spoke the summons came, and Death stood on the threshold.

And as Love rose to meet him, Death bowed his head and stood humbly before his lord; for Love by much loving and much serving had grown great and beautiful, and he was taller and stronger than Death. And Love said—

"Our beloved had fears, but Love has conquered them; let her look into thy face, O Death, teacher and Saviour of men!"

And Death dropped the veil from before his face. For it is given to Love if he be great enough (he who is of the soul, eternal, not he who is of the senses, ephemeral) to reveal the secret of Death to his heart's beloved.

And the woman cried—

"Death hath thine eyes, O Love, how then shall I fear?"

And Love smiled deep into the eyes of the woman, and he said—

"Pain had the eyes of Love, and grief, and retribution, but the eyes of the flesh are long ere they pierce the veil."

And a smile of ineffable beauty and joy shone from the eyes of the woman, as putting one hand in Death's, and holding fast the hand of Love, she passed away from the realm of sight and touch; led by them toward the land she had caught a glimpse of, the land where time is not, and Love is all.

These passages are sufficient to signal to those of our readers who understand and delight in ideal visions that this book is for them, and we will conclude this notice with two brief remarks. The writing shows a tendency to fall into a kind of rhythm which is neither prose nor verse, and in fact in the last pages this is openly confessed by the way the lines are printed. Either genuine prose or more perfect verse would, in our opinion, be more impressive and more beautiful. And as to the teaching of the book, we believe its conception of illimitable progress in the spiritual realm to be profoundly true; yet one must beware not to let the thought of opportunities to come in other lives relax the grip of moral effort in conflict with evil in the present. Wisdom may indeed teach patience and undying hope, but only as a greater spur to immediate and more eager effort. This remark is hardly meant as criticism, but has been suggested by some passages in the ideal visions of this little book.

THE MORAL DAMAGE OF WAR*

THIS is the book of a valiant man with a fire in his soul. It has the smell of the fervent heat that burns up the things of war. His fan is in his hand, and he rigorously clears the threshing-floor, grimly gathers the chaff and applies the unquenchable fire determinedly.

He piles high the iniquities of warfare, saturates them with inflammable indignation, and gives them up to burning. The flames leap high; the wrathful words seize the sin and scorch it utterly; the atmosphere is red with the consuming. But the fire in the book is no wild and wanton outbreak; it is rational and thoroughly under intellectual control. The argument is passionately presented, but it is logically conducted. "The argument that follows," says the author in his Preface, "is not spun from the writer's fancy, but deduced from facts of which he has had intimate experience." The instances and illustrations were not coined in the mint of his imagination, but, in nearly every case, are either paraphrase or indirect quotation of actual sayings and doings, referable, on challenge, to their sources.

From the premise that war does actually, in a given case, inflict grievous hurt upon the moral sense of all classes and professions in a community, it is an easy step to the inference that it must, in every case, inevitably do so, and not a great stride to the conclusion that, therefore, all war is discordant from the religious principles of Jesus.

The author kindles a furnace in Christendom. "Christian morality is the touchstone to which war must now be brought; for, if it cannot justify itself to Christ, it cannot, surely, any longer command the approbation of Christendom. The appeal to Jesus is the only one that is left us. Every other argument has had fair trial, and has had its partial truth acknowledged; but none has been found with dynamic enough to restrain the wrath or destroy the cupidity of the nations, who have gone on fighting just the same." (P. 4.) "The conclusion is plain. Seeing that philosophy and ecclesiasticism are as helpless as politics to deliver us from the red scourge, we must fall back upon the pure ethics of Christianity. Since there is no hope of escape by the exercise of the logical and political faculties, we must abandon them for the practice of morality. We must not go on saying that this war is just or unjust, and that one right or wrong; but must boldly gird up our minds and say that all war is wrong, that every war is sin: that war need not be, must not be, shall not be." (P. 12.)

With persistent flame the author tries war in its effects on the nation, the child, the soldier, the politician, the journalist, the preacher, the missionary, the trader, the citizen, the patriot, and the reformer.

Here and there it may seem as if the blaze of the rhetoric is too fierce, but the case is one for fervent passion.

The timid may deprecate and the callous may retreat, but the earnest must stay till the end. The passion of the book persists with marvellous force till its purpose is accomplished. The whole ground is courageously gone over, and not one relic of war escapes the fiery trial. Taking the book in its own spirit we are caught up by its eloquence and drawn into the comradeship of peace by its holy zeal.

It is a book to be read and felt by the conscience. It is the product of a prophetic soul, and is Miltonic in its periods and its passion. It bears ample evidence of strong, alert intellectual power, and above all of sensitive and enthusiastic ethical energy. Written in the red aftermath of the Transvaal War, it is timely; but it is a book that should keep as part of the protestant prophecy against an armed and bloody Christendom.

SERMONS OF LIFE AND LOVE.*

ANOTHER little volume of sermons by Mr. Page Hopps will be welcomed by many friends, and will make many new friends, if we mistake not, for the earnest and sympathetic preacher, among those who are hungering for a genuine religious life in the midst of the problems and the burdens of these modern times. The little book is daintily issued in guise befitting a Christmas or New Year's gift, and the seven sermons, with practical and helpful wisdom, touch upon the great questions of love and sincerity, of spiritual beauty and the divine significance of business, of cleansing the way and "waiting for God," and of the deathless life. One passage we will quote from the sixth sermon, which pleads for trust in the very present God, whose ways are often past our finding out, and yet so abundantly manifest as for our good. In the midst of inexorable law we yet learn to see that "all's love," and one can wait for God even in the midst of the world's misery, assured that His purpose will work out the good which He intends. This great trust brings God very near to our own life, and it is deepened in the hour of common prayer. The following passage is a good example of the wisdom and the kind of faith that will be found in the book:—

Not only wide and wonderful, then, is the graciousness of God, but minute and deep. The God of angels in heaven is the God of the little child in a London slum; and, at present, through the working out of His laws, both are where they ought to be, and both find strange delights adapted to their experiences and powers—and even the tiny sparrow, as the wise Jesus said, falls not to the ground without the Father; and into its little heart God pours as much of joy as it can hold. What godlike exactness and minuteness as well as godlike might and majesty are involved in this!—since the ever-present God waits in all things—lurking within and behind every possibility and potency in Nature, and waiting to be gracious by evolving ever higher and more delightful forms of life. What a comfort that might be to us all, when left alone, when worried with dust and ashes, when half-strangled with little things that seem unworthy to engross a life, when smarting under baffling defeat, or sin! He knows, though we are foolish. He holds on when we sink down. He succeeds when we seem to fail. He will make that live which dropped from our hands as dead.

Is this what you want to feel to-day? Come, in this great stillness, and stand upon the rock. Set your life in the full light of the Lord. Nursing, perhaps, your hard and bitter thoughts, losing heart and so relaxing your hold, come here; from the innermost of all things He speaks to you; from the secret of His tabernacle He calls. He is waiting—waiting for you—waiting to be gracious. Do you not begin to see it? Have you not seen it in the days of old? And now He waits for you: blessed are you if you can wait for Him.

CRITICISM OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.*

THIS volume contains six lectures delivered lately in St. Margaret's, Westminster, on the initiative of Canon Henson. The first is by Dr. Sanday, who runs through the New Testament section by section, indicating the main critical issues. As compared with his well-known articles in the Expositor ten years ago, his present attitude towards the Synoptic problem differs only by a greater emphasis on the theory of a special source for Luke. He seems hopeful of an ultimate solution, and this should be noted as a corrective of the rather depressing conclusions of Schmiedel. On the Fourth Gospel Dr. Sanday thinks there has been latterly some approximation between opposing views. For students of that gospel it is a misfortune that Dr. Drummond's lectures have not been printed. Dr. Sanday, in pleading for the traditional view, cites the important passage of Clement of Alexandria, which says that when John saw that the "bodily" (or "external") facts had been made plain by the other evangelists, he himself composed a "spiritual" gospel. So construed, the evidence is strong for the theory that John's gospel is a supplement to the other three.

Dr. Drummond, if we remember him rightly, took the words "bodily" and "spiritual" rather in the sense of "literal" and "mystical or allegorical"; and this distinction, so agreeable to the habits of Alexandrian exegesis, seems to throw a flood of light on the true character of the gospel. We observe that Dr. Sanday does not commit himself to Harnack's argument that Prisca (Priscilla), wife of Aquila, wrote the epistle to the Hebrews, though he admits that it is supported with much skill. Perhaps if Prisca were capable of that letter, Paul's estimate of the sex might have been higher than appears from his epistles. The second lecture deals with the manuscripts. It is by Mr. F. G. Kenyon, of the British Museum, whose recent volume on the Textual Criticism of the New Testament Dr. Sanday here describes as bringing English scholarship once more to the front in this branch of the subject. Mr. F. C. Burkitt, of Cambridge, follows with an account of the chief Ancient Versions, and Dr. Chase describes the History of the Canon.

Two somewhat more detailed studies follow: the first, by Mr. A. C. Headlam, discusses the dates of the New Testament books with the object of showing that their composition falls within the first century; the second is a somewhat apologetic vindication, by Dean Bernard, of Dublin, of the historical character of the Book of Acts. The names of the lecturers is sufficient guarantee of the excellence of each study after its kind, but we feel that the title of the volume and its preface raise expectations that the book as a whole does not fulfil. Canon Henson thinks the results of Biblical science should be communicated to the Church at large, and have their proper effect on current teaching and worship; and he speaks of the New Learning which is slowly revolutionising Christian thought. But the impression which the uninstructed reader would derive from this volume is that there is practically nothing to revise in regard to the traditional views of the New Testament. That this impression would correspond to the present position of New Testament studies few would maintain. One explanation of it is the choice of subjects; it will be seen that they all fall within the literary sphere. We have noted a few slips. Mr. Headlam's use of the argument that absence of developed organisation is a sign of early date (p. 163) is in conflict with what he has already said about the Pastorals (p. 158). In stating that the Four Gospels are explicitly recognised in the Muratorian Fragment (p. 103), Dr. Chase overlooks the mutilation of the part which doubtless dealt with Matthew and Mark. Cheltenham is misprinted on p. 127; "Nav.," in the citation of Trenaeus (p. 164), stands for "Haer"; the name of Polycrates is wrongly spelled on p. 172. It would be a relief if, for a while, writers on the epistle to the Hebrews would refrain from quoting Origen's remark that God only knows who wrote it. It occurs three times in this volume (pp. 26, 124, and 160).

THE Christmas number of the English Illustrated Magazine looks attractive, in spite of interleaved advertisements. Its first article tells "How Japanese Children Celebrate the New Year," both illustrations and narrative by Yoshio Markino, and other beautifully illustrated articles are "In the Days of Frost and Snow" and "Christmas with the Italian Masters." Good Cheer is this year an "Imperial Number" of Good Words with a bird's-eye view of Greater Britain, and a number of "Songs of the Empire," prize-winners and others. The Sunday Magazine number is a children's fairy story, "Bundy in the Greenwood," by Harold Begbie, illustrated by Gordon Browne. In the Strand, which is a double number, will be found an interesting series of pictures of the Panels in Sir L. Alma-Tadema's Hall, an article on "Ruskin and his Books" by E. T. Cook, and another on "Darkest Siberia and its Political Exiles," an "appeal to civilisation" by Harry de Windt. Fifty pages of the Woman at Home are devoted to "Famous Portrait Painters of the Day," including Sargent, Richmond, Collier, Watts, Herkomer, and others who certainly are not famous to the same degree. This number has also the conclusion of Ellen Thorneycroft Fowler's story "Fuel of Fire," which, if the critics had not assured us that it was equal to anything this clever writer has produced, we should have taken for an immature work published on the strength of her present reputation, and often wearisome in its excess of cleverness. To Cornhill Mr. Sidney Low contributes a nineteenth century study of "Kossuth."

OBITUARY.

MISS EVERS, OF STOURBRIDGE.

By the death of Miss Evers, the Stourbridge Presbyterian Chapel loses an active member, who for nearly fifty years has been in close touch with the work and institutions of the congregation. She was born in Staffordshire, near Coalbournbrook, in 1820, and was the daughter of the late Mr. Samuel Evers. The family has been associated for over seventy years with the village of Cradley, where Mr. Evers carried on ironworks. During early life Miss Evers was a member of the Netherend Presbyterian Chapel, but on coming to Stourbridge in 1854 she attached herself to the kindred congregation in the town. With a zealous and enthusiastic interest in religious, social and political progress, she combined a trained perception and judgment, which made her co-operation valuable, and eagerly sought for, in matters relating to the advancement of the better life of the neighbourhood. While showing a warm interest in the chapel, and in the principles of Unitarianism, she devoted an especial care to the voluntary day school of which till the day of her death she was the responsible treasurer. She was a life-long Liberal, being connected with that party no less by conviction than by early association and family feeling. To all philanthropic enterprises in the town she gave a ready help, and in charitable actions of a quiet character she was able to afford relief, wide in extent, and irrespective of the opinions of the recipients.

A memorial service was held on Sunday, Dec. 7, in the Presbyterian Chapel, High-street.

THE LATE REV. J. PANTON HAM.

THE funeral of the Rev. J. Panton Ham took place on Thursday week in London, at the Abney Park Cemetery, the service being conducted by the Rev. Henry Gow.

Mr. James Panton Ham sends us the following note:—"In the obituary notice of my late father, there is a slight mistake which it may be as well to amend. My father came to London as the sole minister of Essex-street Chapel, and opened the chapel for evening services, and the chapel-house for day and Sunday schools, which for years were a success under the able management of some of the leading members of the congregation. This entailed a very considerable amount of work, and my father gladly availed himself of a kind offer from the late Rev. Thomas Madge to take the alternate morning services, and this may be the cause of the mistake. I need hardly say that the members of the congregation were only too glad to fall in with this arrangement and again have the opportunity of listening to their venerated friend, whose beautiful and simple teaching, expressed in the purest English, even I, then a lad, could appreciate."

A correspondent writes:—"I may perhaps be permitted to add a postscript to the notice of the Rev. J. Panton Ham which appeared in your columns last week. His old friends in England had seen little of him in recent years, and it will be a pleasure to them to hear that he lost none of his vivacity of manner and keen interest in affairs in extreme old age. I called to see him about a fortnight before his death, and he was then very well and quite bright and youthful in mind. He talked about his ministry at Cross-street Chapel, Manchester, and he referred to what he called his own rashness and vehemence in those days, when he was fresh from a life of controversy at Bristol, and he wondered that the people had been so patient with him. Then he touched upon his friendship with Dr. Sadler, and his awe of Dr. Martineau, and various topics, grave and gay, which showed that his mind had lost none of its edge. He was particularly interested to hear about some of the younger men in our ministry, and the prospects of Manchester College at Oxford. So youthful was his spirit, and so open to fresh interests and ideas, that it was not always easy to remember his burden of more than eighty years. It was a quiet and happy old age, mellowed in spirit and patient with growing infirmity, which it will always be a privilege to remember.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

CHRISTMAS.

"A MERRY CHRISTMAS!" to all the children who read this column, or have it read to them. I wonder how many of you there are, and how much you are doing, if we could reckon it all up together, to make other people happy this Christmas time. That, you know quite well, is what really makes the merriest Christmas for everyone.

Now I am going to tell you a little bit of a story, which was told long ago in an old Christian Register. It is a Dolly that tells it.

I am only Dollinda, but a very nice-looking doll, and I notice a good many things. Last winter I hung in the window of a shop in Oxford-street. I often saw little girls looking through the window and pointing at me. Sometimes they looked starved and very cold, and I wished they had some of the warm things in the shop next to ours, which had beautiful woolly shawls, and gloves, and warm mittens and other comfortable things in the window. But it was us dollies that the children liked best to look at.

I remember one little girl, who came every day and stood looking at me, with her face pressed very close to the window. She was there the day Molly's aunt bought me, and as the man took me out of the window two great eyes followed me longingly, and a little red hand threw me a kiss. I smiled back at her just as long as I could; and when Molly's aunt went away with me, I heard a little voice say, "Good-bye! good-bye!"

Molly has a great many dolls, ten at least, and she seems to be very fond of them all; but I think she likes me best, and she calls me Dollinda. Sometimes when I think of all she has, I remember those other little girls, who looked so longingly through the shop window, and wished they could have some too.

Molly's music-teacher came here yesterday, to see if Molly would give her some of her playthings for a Christmas-tree for poor children. All the time she was talking, she was working away on a doll's dress. She said Molly must give something. Molly looked her old dolls over. First she took up Bella, then Alice, then Louisa Alcott, then Peggy. She put me behind her, where the little music-teacher could not see me; but I fell over on purpose, and the teacher took me up and said, "This one looks as good as new, Molly. Can't you give this one?"

"What, give Dollinda away?" cried Molly. "How could I!"

She took up Peggy, and seemed to be trying to make up her mind to give her. Peggy is pretty old, and half of her smile is worn off; but I was pleased to see Molly lay her tenderly across her lap and say: "Peggy can't go! She was my first child."

"I would not put a doll like that on the tree," said the music-teacher. Molly gathered her dolls up indignantly. Then the teacher said: "Last Christmas, when I was going past a shop in Oxford-street, I saw a little girl looking in at a window. 'It's gone!' she said softly to herself. 'It's gone! My dolly, my dolly!'"

"Where is your dolly gone?" I asked; but she looked frightened and started to run away. "She had great big blue eyes," said the music-teacher, "and wore a long water-proof. I wanted to buy her a doll, but she ran quickly away. I could not forget her poor little blue face."

"No more can I," I whispered; but Molly did not hear me, although she was stroking my hair at the time.

"But I have found her, Molly," said the music-teacher, "and she will be at the school on Christmas Eve, but I have no doll for her yet."

"I can't send her a broken one," said Molly thoughtfully. "I must send her Dollinda, my dear Dollinda!"

Generous Molly! She is going to keep her word. It will be hard for me to leave Molly, but I shall see the little blue-nosed girl again—the first one who cared for me—the child who threw me a kiss with her cold, red fingers. Shall you sacrifice anything for anybody this Christmas?

A PRISONER OF WAR.*

IT must have been an afternoon at the end of March or the beginning of April. We had been out all day, and I was returning to my quarters at the head of my twelve men. We were riding along a lane, between two high hedges, when suddenly we came in sight of some kind of barricade, which apparently was meant to bar the way in front of us. There was a small gravel-pile, and on the top of it a wheel-barrow turned upside down, and some cut branches and sticks. Taken all together, it did not rise two feet above the ground. It did not look very formidable, and we knew that the Danes had retired north of the Fjord; but even as they were, these fortifications might quite well hide some desperadoes. I therefore called out to my men to halt, and despatched two men through an opening in the hedge, ordering them quickly and cautiously to get round the entrenchment so as to take the enemy in the rear. That the barricades were not deserted I knew, for now and again, as we sat watching them, someone or something would pop up behind them and disappear again almost instantly, leaving us no time to discover what it was. Once, however, this something did remain visible long enough for me to find out what kind of an enemy we had before us, and thereby reassured, I gave the command "Forward!" and on we went. At that moment we saw the enemy abandon his position and retire in wild disorder through the hedge.

There were three men. One of them to be sure wore petticoats, but he made up for this irregular outfit by showing more courage than the rest. He stopped one moment before disappearing into the hedge, calling back something the meaning of which I could not catch, and then he, too, disappeared.

We all burst out laughing, and having regained courage, we advanced merrily towards the abandoned entrenchment. But—we had reckoned without our host, for when we were only a few paces off, a little figure suddenly rose up behind the barricade, and jumping on to the mound swung a formidable sword above his head. We just managed to stop our horses in time to save him. Never in all my life have I seen so much decision, courage and passion concentrated in so small a spot as that little distorted face. I give you my word that for a moment he held us spell-bound. Then I said, and at that time I could make myself pretty well understood in Danish: "What does this mean?"

No answer.

"Now get out of the way, my boy, and let us pass," I said. But the little figure did not move from where it stood, the lips were only more tightly pressed, and he stared right into my eyes, still holding the sword, lifted over his shoulders, in both his hands—it was almost as long as himself. For, dear me, what a little thing he looked, and was.

I really did not know just at the moment what to do. I am perfectly certain that had we advanced only one step he would have rushed in amongst our horses' feet with his sword, and who could tell what would then have been the fate of our desperate little enemy? After a moment's hesitation I decided to take him at his own valuation.

"Captain," I said and saluted, "you must surrender. Your men have deserted you. You see you are in our power."

He made no answer, but only winced a little and looked somewhat less terrible.

I dismounted. "You will understand that you are my prisoner. I have more men coming there," I said, pointing to the two dragoons who were returning from the opposite direction. "Please surrender your weapon."

He hesitated for one moment; then he handed me his sword, but he remained where he stood without any sign that he meant to retire. Here, of course, I might have ended the little farce, or rather drama, for he certainly was not a comic figure. But I was young and thoughtless then, and, besides, I was full of sympathy and understanding for this little dauntless knight, and so I resolved that we should stick to our rôles till he himself got tired of the play we were acting.

I therefore said, perfectly seriously: "I must ask you to mount in front of one of my men and follow me."

* The officer who told me this little story had served as a young lieutenant in the Austrian army during the war of 1864 between Denmark and Germany.—M. B. W.

This story is to appear also in a Swedish magazine, Ord och Bild. Two other stories by Miss Westenholz have appeared in Cornhill, March, 1901; and October, 1902.—ED. INQ.

Now if at that moment he had shown any sign of fear or repentance, I would have let him go for what he seemed to be, a little boy of seven years; but his face retained unchanged the look of unrelenting sternness, so I gave my orders to one of my men, an old married man, with little boys of his own at home, and then I helped the Captain to mount in front of him.

"Don't you think, Captain," I asked, that we might get hold of one of your men. You might try to call one of them."

He hesitated one moment, and then he turned towards the hedge and called: "Karen." But not till he had called her several times did Karen's head appear beneath the hedge. "Just come out here, Karen," I said; "we won't hurt you."

Karen, who proved herself to be even yet smaller than my prisoner, first looked to her captain, then cautiously crept out from the hedge—nearer than that, or on to the road she would not come. Though she was as frightened as a little mouse, you could see at first sight that she was the sister of my captured lion. I therefore said to her:

"I have taken your brother prisoner; now you must carry this note home with you to your parents." Tearing a leaf from my pocket-book I wrote on it, in German of course: "I have carried off your heroic son as my prisoner. I shall take good care of him in every way, and send him safely home early to-morrow moning." I signed it with my name and my full address.

Karen took the letter reluctantly. "Are you not coming home with us, Martin?" she said, and looked very much as if she were going to cry. I looked up at the Captain; his face was very red and his lips quivered. I was just going to propose to him that he should go home with Karen, when he said—and his eyes shot fire as he spoke—"You cowards!" his voice displaying such an overflow of contempt and anger that I checked myself, feeling how insulting such a proposal on my part would be. So I simply turned to Karen and said: "Now you run home, Karen. The Captain is my prisoner, and no one shall do him any harm." And having ascertained that the rest of the hostile forces were in Karen's immediate vicinity, I mounted and we moved on.

We had the best part of five miles to ride, but I knew my prisoner was in kind hands, and at our door he was put down safe and sound, even his hands having been kept warm and comfortable. I took him with me into my room, and here it was that his manly spirits were put to the hardest test by my good hostess, the farmer's wife. Seeing him, she cried out, greatly amazed, "Goodness me! is not that Pastor Hansen's Martin?"

"Yes, Mrs. Christensen," I said, "very likely it is; but he is my prisoner now."

"Good gracious, Herr Lieutenant, but will that do? Are you going to carry off the little innocents now?"

"He is a soldier, Mrs. Christensen, and he wanted to kill us, so I had to take him prisoner," I said, decisively.

"Oh!" the good woman went on lamenting, "but what will Pastor Hansen say?"

I read in Martin's face that he was struggling hard to escape a most humiliating catastrophe, and to save him from it I interrupted the good woman's lamentations, saying, "Now, Mrs. Christensen, do be off and get us something nice to eat, for we are absolutely starving."

The Captain and I got on splendidly. I showed him all my arms; he loaded and unloaded my pistols, he counted my cartridges, and putting them up as "soldiers," we fought a regular battle with them on the table. And as our friendship advanced we threw off the stiff military form. I found myself calling him simply Martin, and he did not seem in any way to resent the familiarity. Finally, when we were tired, I helped to unbutton his tunic and garters, and put him to bed on the sofa that had been arranged for him in my bedroom. Then I left him, as I thought, in the happiest mood.

But I had not been at work by the lamp in my sitting-room for ten minutes when the door opened and the Captain appeared in his shirt, his face bathed in tears.

"I daren't be alone in the dark," he sobbed.

"Why?" I said astonished, "what is it you are afraid of?"

"Ogres!" he said.

"But there are no ogres," I said.

"Oh, yes, they make themselves in the dark in there, and then they come out from all the corners. And I am so terribly frightened," he said, coming quite close to me and looking piteously up into my eyes from his tear-stained face.

I was just going to put him to shame, when I was suddenly reminded of Mrs. Christensen's earwigs, and how I hated the way they had of "making themselves" and of coming out from every possible and impossible corner; so I only said: "Very well, then, we will leave the door open to the light." And rising, I took my little foe in my arms and carried him off to his bed.

"Thank you, Lieutenant," he said, very humbly and tenderly, while his little soft warm hand caressed my cheek; and I don't mind telling it now, the tears rose into my eyes as I remembered that I was really here as his enemy, having forced my way into his country to kill his brothers and rob him of his land.

Just as he had gone to sleep, a carriage came thundering up the paved yard and stopped at the door, and in came the angry clergyman, his father. He was indeed angry, and I had to listen to many a hard truth, and to acknowledge that my conduct was unpardonable, that I had behaved like a boy, and that it would be anything but pleasant for me when the case was brought before my Colonel, as he certainly intended that it should be. But when at last, having exhausted his wrath, he could be brought to listen to my explanations, he became somewhat mollified, and when he understood that I had been led to act as I had done partly by my love and admiration for the man and the hero in his little son, we were thoroughly reconciled, and having seen the boy soundly asleep in his prison, he even consented to let me keep him to be sent home in state the next day.

Martin "slept out the Captain," and awoke as a happy boisterous little boy who talked incessantly while we helped each other to wash and dress. When we had had our breakfast, I said to him, "Your father was here last night after you had gone to sleep, and I promised him to send you home to-day."

He looked doubtfully at me. "Martin," I said, and I took him between my knees, holding both his hands in mine, "you know you are only a little boy, and you know you cannot really fight big soldiers. But you were willing to give your life for your country, and none of us can do more than that. Therefore I took you prisoner yesterday, and therefore I release you to-day. You cannot yet distinguish the real dangers from those that 'make themselves,' but when some day you can, I know that you won't run away, but face them like a brave true soldier."

He hung his head, but when I made him a present of one of my pistols—without any cartridges, of course—his spirits rose again. And when he rode away in front of Franz, with another dragoon as his garde d'honneur, he joyfully waved his cap in good-bye to me as I sat mounted in front of my men saluting our gallant little enemy.

But I felt dissatisfied and ill at ease all that day. That little figure on the child-barricade seemed to me a symbol of the poor little country which the armies of the two great Powers had invaded and overwhelmed, and for the time it marred the pride and pleasure I took in my profession.

CUM CHRISTO IN DEO.

I WAKE to life that is from life that seemed,
Grow unfamiliar with familiar scenes:
Life's strength is love—I knew not love, but dreamed;
Who weak had leaned not, now, in strength he leans.

Vision of roses pale on golden bars
That lowly droop, yet not in weakness droop!
Serene sweet splendour as of twilight stars
That shine in some lone constellated group.

Thy spirit breaks the threads life loveless wove
Into the web that seems the life we reach:
When spirit speaks to spirit life is love,
And deathless love is boundless life to each.

In Love the world was made which love alone
May see, that sees not darkly perfect things;
That sees the wrecks on timeless shore-lands strown,
Where Faith walks firm and Hope the closer clings.

Sweet love that knows no pain, and soothes the pain
It sees, creates the ancient world anew;
From thee I draw life's strength whose deeps again
Well up from founts where the visioned roses grew.

PEACE AT CHRISTMAS.

THANK GOD, that after three years in which Christmas came to us under the dark cloud of war, now at last we may rejoice again in the great festival without that one most palpable and bitter contradiction of the Christ-spirit to mar our joy! Much of the land, which was the scene of the long conflict, is indeed still desolate, and both here and in South Africa the heavy burdens, the inevitable fruit of such a conflict, are pressing upon the people and compelling them to realise the terrible cost of war. Yet peace has been made; and in its train have come earnest and honourable efforts to heal the breaches, to make good such of the destruction as is not irretrievable. There is hope of a new spirit of friendliness, a loyal endeavour of those who were lately foes to understand one another, to find a common ground in generous appreciation, to work together for a better future.

> "Peace on earth and good-will!"
> Souls that are gentle and still > Hear the first music of this > Far-off, infinite bliss.

Simple souls heard it, in the long distant past, when first the glad tidings came to them which JESUS brought. Peace, brotherhood, good-will; a blessing on the peace-maker, the gentle, the pure in heart; the children rejoicing in the sunlight of love, the world redeemed from the spirit of violence and hate, and flooded with a new glory in the conviction that Love is supreme. Peace on earth! that was the promise, and through weary centuries has been the undying hope. Now with a new intensity we understand the bitterness of that which is contrary to peace, and this Christmas prayer, even more than the Christmas rejoicing, must be in our hearts, with deep and fervent meaning, that our people may seek peace and hold fast to it, that our statesmen may seek always that highest honour, by the way of patient wisdom and conciliation, by which they and their nation must seek first the Kingdom of GOD on earth.

Our thanksgiving will have this year a new gladness, and yet it must be blended with a very sorrowful sense of the heavy burdens of Poverty in our midst, rendered heavier by the terrible waste of three years of war. With the sorrow there must be a steadfast purpose, that we will patiently take up our share of the burden, humbly seeking the best way to help. We must give, if we would rejoice, and have any hope of the greater joy, of which the Christmas festival is the divine foreshadowing and promise.

THE CHRISTMAS SPIRIT.

THE spirit that is abroad at this season of the year throughout Christendom, and which manifests itself in a certain tone of mind which we may call sweet reasonableness, and in a certain expansive sympathy which we may call thoughtful kindliness, does more to prove the vitality of Christianity than do the efforts and energies spent in maintaining that it is vital and in setting forth wherein its nature and meaning consist. And, as a consequence of this spirit, there is felt, perhaps more widely and more vividly than at any other time, a deeper sense of peace and joy.

There is a certain magnetism in the thousand associations that cluster around the customs of this season, drawing men nearer to each other. And if the season is marked by those gatherings of friends and families, those attempts to keep faith with the past in spite of the rapid changes of the years and the frequent snapping of links, it is still more marked by men's attention being directed towards two significant quarters—significant, I mean, from the Christian standpoint—towards childhood and towards poverty. Surely at no other time than this are thoughts bent so kindly towards the "little ones," to use the expression in both the senses employed by Christ—viz., of children and of the weak and helpless ones in the social struggle.

The Christian era, unlike any other era, is dated from the founder of the Christian religion; and ever as we look back at the early days of this era, we associate it with childhood and with poverty, as later on we associate the whole career of Christ mainly with children and with the poor, even up to the last day of his life, when, turning towards the poor who wept for him on his journey to the cross, he could bid them weep for themselves and for their children. In Art the humble scene of the birth, whether it was thought to have been in a cavern or a manger, is often depicted as radiant with a symbolical light that shines from the body of the new-born child. The light of the child spirit glorifies the humble, the poor, the commonplace, leads us to the Kingdom of Heaven; and the Kingdom of Heaven manifests itself on earth wherever attention—sleepless, loving attention—is directed to the weak, the struggling, the wretched, the oppressed, the poor. When we read the pages of the Gospels, this method and this aim impress us as being the two prominent features in the teaching and work of Jesus. For him the religious life is pure childlike trust in God and goodness; the social life is to express itself by voluntary and affectionate attention to and help of the weak and helpless. That this is the very essence of Christianity in the heart and in the state or society, I know no section of Christians who would deny. The universal feeling throughout Christendom at this season attests it, the feeling that prompts elders to join in the gaiety of the little ones, who are so easily made gay, to add to the joy of those who are so easily made joyful, because, giving themselves up, for a time at least, to the spell of the child-nature with its winning trustfulness, they catch something of the very essence and reality of religion, for they learn how to trust God and goodness from the little ones who trust them, who are, as it were God's deputies, God and goodness to them. And further this universal feeling prompts an acquiescence, if also only for a time, in that principle of voluntary and affectionate attention to the weak ones and the hapless ones of society; and people feel that for one day at least men's prayer for daily bread shall not go unanswered at the hands of God's deputies and stewards.

Society seems sometimes to be like that mother in Hans Andersen's pretty story, only a little more deaf, who listened to her little underfed girl repeating the Lord's Prayer. After the little one had prayed for daily bread, she whispered something to herself which the mother could not hear; the mother asked her to repeat it, when she faintly heard the little girl praying, "Give us this day our daily bread, and please a little more butter upon it." That which the weaker ones in Society have long whispered, they have at length spoken up a little louder, and that I think at the bidding of a compassion which turns no deaf ear to whispered prayers, but rather stoops to listen. And at this season such a whispered prayer men would feel inclined to answer either for its pathos or its humour.

People are in all sects and sections of the Christian Church trying to get at the essence of Christianity. This may indeed be truly said to be the object of search amid all the bewildering mazes of theological controversy and discussion, and in this as in so many other matters where simplicity of apprehension and simplicity of statement are needful, so that the most ordinary mind may grasp principles of life and conduct, the voice of the people is the voice of God. After all the dogmatic systems purporting to give the essence of Christianity in indispensable formularies have passed through the crucibles of common sense and the simple ingenuous heart, Christianity is presented in the simple and indeed highly refined and precious form of childlike trust in God and goodness, and universal brotherly helpfulness, and chiefly helpfulness of the strong for the weak. The essence of Christianity is not something learnt by heart, but something learnt in the heart—feelings towards God and Man growing up into the fruit of Peace and Joy. And where men see manifestly growing grapes and figs, not all the sharpest points in the prickliest leaves and pages of crabbed Old Theologies will persuade them that such fruits are growing from thorns and thistles.

In this pause amid the hurry and throng, the worry and bustle, the toil and moil of life, the truth and simplicity of Christ's teaching come home to men, and they best know that teaching when they feel it. So hallowed and so gracious is the time, the nights and days so wholesome, that no sheeted ghosts of controversy, pale skeletons of religion clanking their rusty chains, dare stir abroad. It is a Truce of God from the haunting sense of grim and comic unrealities stalking about in dead men's shoes. When Christ dies the graveyards yawn and the ghosts of those who have fallen asleep begin to walk and haunt the minds of men. When Christ lives, they linger just a moment, then quietly steal away; their perturbed spirits cease to trouble, and their weary bones are laid to rest. The poor Ghost of Theology having harrowed up men's souls, and spoken unutterable things, scents the morning air. Its only light is in its latter end.

The glow-worm shows the matin to be near,
And 'gins to pale his ineffectual fire.

CHRISTMAS VISION.

WE saw Thee in Thy balmy nest,
Young dawn of our eternal Day!
We saw Thine eyes break from their East,
And chase the trembling shades away.
We saw Thee; and we blest the sight,
We saw Thee by Thine Own sweet light.
(Crashaw: Shepherds' Hymn).

THE mind's eye, someone has said, sees in all objects what it brings with it the means of seeing. For this reason theologians do well to remind us in any question concerning the evidences for what is true that we must take into consideration what they describe as the antecedent probabilities in the case. These antecedent probabilities are among "the means of seeing." A trusted friend, whose statements I have learned to credit, brings me one day an announcement which I hesitate to accept as true. His testimony, in spite of previous confidence in its worth, is not sufficient to produce conviction. There is something in the strange matter of the announcement itself which hinders my acceptance of it. Or rather there is something in me that resists its assimilation. The condition of my mind makes the statement antecedently improbable. "Nothing," says Mozley, "can engraft itself upon us which is alien to us. There must be a congeniality between ourselves and it before we can incorporate it by belief."

Much discussion of various religious doctrines has been rendered futile because this consideration has been overlooked. Rival declarations on such a subject, for example, as the Forgiveness of Sins have again and again been made to hinge upon diverse interpretations of Scripture passages. This is the main quarter whence the evidence has been sought, and disputers have imagined that their respective attitudes were indeed determined by what they found there, whereas, of course, each has found what he brought with him the means of descrying. It is obvious that the discoveries of two persons will be widely dissimilar, to the one of whom sin is a grievous personal reality, while to the other it has existence only as an external and public disability. Any doctrine of redemption which has arisen out of the former experience, and whose every term is conditioned by it, must from the first be improbable to one who knows no such experience. No contention that the doctrine is Scriptural, even though he accept without question the authority of Scripture, can avail to lodge within him any real conviction of its truth. It is founded on something that is foreign to his perceptions, and therefore cannot engraft itself upon him. An initial alienation discredits all subsequent testimony.

We may pursue a similar line of thought in many directions. It may be applied to the attitude we preserve towards the Bible and the mind we bring to it. What we find in the Bible to-day is largely what the Bible itself has taught us to find. We who read are in a great degree the product of twenty centuries in whose development the book has been a constant agent, and influences issuing therefrom are in our bones and blood. Amid plentiful divergence of dogmatic view respecting its origin and construction, sympathetic students agree in beholding it as the record of successive deliverances experienced by the human soul. But it is our own inner need of deliverance and our own experience of its satisfaction that establishes the sympathy and makes such an interpretation possible. And whence have these taken their rise? They have come in large measure, need and satisfaction alike, from the operative power of the Book itself upon our souls.

Again, we see the same principle at work when we review the feelings with which we are wont to approach the special times and seasons that an historic religion selects for celebration. The great days of the Christian year have each their message. But the messages we severally overhear as we come within reach of them are determined by the means of hearing which we bring with us. We awake on Christmas morning and remember the Nativity. We enter once again the lowly chamber and gaze on the mother and her child. What do we see? Manifestly, all depends on the light by which we see him, on the power of vision that we bring. We may look and all will be in shadow, and no light, small or great, relieve our darkness. And we may look and see the heavens opened and a glory descending.

Yet, if this latter be vouchsafed, the power of vision which enables us to apprehend it is not self-created. It is the Child himself who has been the principal agent in its bestowal, "the young dawn of our eternal Day." He has opened our eyes so that our sight of all things is in part governed by him, our sight of himself no less than the rest. He has opened them from within, by invading our life, becoming at once its greatest disturbance and its most complete repose. He has shown us to ourselves and wounded us with the disclosure of all the interval that stretches between our uncomeliness and his perfections, and in the same hour has bound up the wounds and cancelled the distances and put a new song in our mouth, the song of deliverance and of conscious union with the Father through him.

If this has been our history, then our whole mind and all that it contemplates are conditioned by it. Love of the Deliverer, "that highest of all affections," has become its master-principle and controls the exercise of every faculty. This is the Love that > . . . . adds a precious seeing to the eye;

> And gives to every power a double power,
> Above its functions and its offices.

Such is the means of seeing we bring with us on Christmas morning as we reread the Gospel narratives of the Nativity, and that enables us to receive as an intimate and personal reminder the angelic declaration, "Unto you is born this day a Saviour." "He," says St. Bernard, "that is enlightened by the Sun of Righteousness which lightens every man that cometh into the world, is able to behold him in the degree that he is enlightened by him."

"EVERY-MAN": A MORALITY PLAY.*

MANY who had the pleasure and the privilege of seeing the performance of Every-man by the Elizabethan Stage Society in London or Oxford in the summer of 1901, and again in the London season of the present year, must have been struck with the strong impression the piece made upon the audience. They went to see a show, something they thought might be quaint or unreal, they hardly knew what. People came away touched to the core; the weaker or superstitious were even terrified, religious emotion was awakened, and few indeed were those who scoffed. In the presence of the eternal verities of human existence brought vividly before them, the audience forgot for the moment the means by which this was done; the manner of the play and its literary history were a secondary thought under the spell of its dramatic power. This is surely the highest testimony to the skill of the ancient author as well as a tribute to the admirable performance and mount of this modern revival, though no doubt the moment in the present wave of serious conscience and feeling is favourable to its reception.

The attention of students has long been attracted to our early drama, but it may not be out of place, in view of the interest excited by Every-man, to recall what is a morality play, and what are its relations to dramatic literature. For this we must go back to early times. Moralities form a later stage in the English serious drama, in which the Biblical plays came first. In most countries the theatre originally began with the service of public religious worship, in Greece, in the East, in France and England, to name no more. Religion at first adopted, nay, rather created the drama. The old liturgy of the Christian Church lent itself to the idea; the Gospel scenes, the stories of Daniel and of other prophets who testified to Christ were represented in the Church by the priests as part of the office. This was done particularly at Christmas and at Easter, in celebration of the Nativity and of the Resurrection. Several plays in France still exist which illustrate this early means of instructing the people. An early liturgic drama was Les Prophètes du Christ (Limoges), performed at Christmas, in which the personages were Israel, Moyses, Isaias, Jeremias, Daniel, Abacuc, David, Simeon, Elizabet (wife of Zacharia), [John] Babtista, Virgilius, Nabucodonosor, and the Sybil, all to honour the coming Christ. The Daniel (of Beauvais), written in the twelfth century chiefly in Latin verse, with the notes to which the young clerks chanted it at Christmas, was semi-liturgic but not part of the office; in a third play devoted to the story of Balaam (Procession de l'Ane, Rouen) the manners of the times permitted that his ass also should be brought into the cathedral to take his rôle.

By degrees additions crept in, fancy travelled beyond the Scripture language, pieces were written in verse, and in the vulgar tongue instead of Latin. The performances came out of the church, and were given in the churchyard, presently in more convenient places. The Church encouraged them; the actors and writers, being clerks or monks, men of the people themselves, had the same grim sense of humour, and would put in a touch now and again to make the audience laugh, and so fix the lesson all the better.

The institution, by Pope Urban IV. in 1246 (enforced by a decree of 1311), of the feast of Corpus Christi, to be kept on the Thursday after Trinity Sunday, gave occasion for the performance of regular sets of plays on religious subjects. The early summer always has been a favourite time for such performances; as now the Ober Ammergau play properly is on St. John's Day, so our old actors of fourteenth and later centuries were most in vogue at Whitsuntide, Corpus Christi, and Mid summer day. In England they were widely spread; we find from notices in old accounts of church wardens, gild officers, and cities, &c, that from the thirteenth or fourteenth to the end of the sixteenth centuries religious plays were frequent in parishes, villages, and towns. Some were single plays, as at Sleaford the play of The Ascension; at Brome (Norfolk), Abraham and Isaac; at York we find the Creed Play and the Play of Our Lord's Prayer. Some were sets or cycles of plays which, like the old fourteenth century poem Cursor Mundi, gave many of the chief stories from the Old Testament and carried on the life of the world in the full details of the history of Jesus. Not only the testimony of the "prophets," but other beliefs current during the Middle Ages, e.g., that portions of the Old Testament typify the events of the New, and the popularity of the apocryphal legends, besides some Church doctrines of the day, are reflected in these plays, written by able but unknown authors. Four of these sets have come down to us, written in English verse, those of Chester, Coventry, York and Wakefield (Towneley plays), each set consisting of thirty or forty plays more or less. The cycles of London, Beverley, Newcastle and Dublin, as well as most of the single country plays, are lost; this is greatly due to the Reformation, when these performances were doomed along with the old form of religion. Yet even Luther said of those in Germany that "such spectacles often do more good, and produce more impression, than sermons." M. Petit de Julleville, the historian of the early drama in France, thus describes in words of general application the idea pervading the mystère of the fifteenth century.

> By exhibiting to the spectator the history of his faith, by impersonating under his eyes the sacred objects of his adoration, by offering to his sight the most august and most tragic drama of which this earth has ever been the theatre, by even daring to present to him under a palpable and living form the anguish of his latter days, the terrors of death and the hopes of the next life, the mystery filled his soul with deep and, perhaps, salutary emotion.

The craft gilds in towns undertook the expense and the performance of these cycles, each gild taking a play. They took place out of doors, usually on stages drawn through the streets. The term mystery, from the Latin ministerium, act, or function, has a two-fold and historic meaning. First, it was applied to the liturgic drama as part of the "function" of the Church; and, second, the word also denoting the work-action or art of combined workmen, when the secularised play was produced by a "craft, art, or mystery" it still could use the name. But the appellation belongs more to France than to England, where the common name was miracle plays. Another class of religious plays was that in which the life, or some incident in the life, of a saint formed the groundwork of the piece and its moral. We have, however, but few vestiges of these in England.

To drive home moral and religious truths by the impersonation of abstract qualities instead of Biblical or historic characters was the object of a "morality," and some of these were concurrent in England with the religious play. One or two plays in the Coventry cycle are linked on to the moralities by a similar treatment; at York we had the fourteenth century play of Our Lord's Prayer, "in which all manner of vices and sins were held up to scorn, and the virtues were held up to praise." This play is, unfortunately, lost; but we know that one of the vices in it gave name to a part called Accidia (sloth). Another early morality is The Pride of Life, somewhat akin to Every-man, in which Man is the King, adjured by the Queen, a true woman, to remember that death will come, which, supported by his knights, Strength and Health, and his messenger, Mirth, he stoutly objects to do (of this but a portion exists). Other plays of this kind are The Castle of Perseverance, Mankind, Mind Will and Understanding, The World and the Child, Nature, and so on. There was some vice "held up to scorn" and made ridiculous in most of the moralities, so that the "Vice in a play" became a sort of conventional character and lightened the gravity of the piece. Morality plays chiefly flourished in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, from Henry VI. to Elizabeth. They were instruments used for the education of the people under a gradual change of sentiment. Every-man, "the production of Catholic piety," is contrasted by Professor Ward with Lusty Juventus (written by R. Wever about 1550) in which the doctrines of the Reformation, including that of justification by faith, are distinctly taught.

The writers of the earlier moralities are generally unknown. Under the Tudors they appear, and Every-man is one of the first the source of which can be shown. It was printed in England four times (an indication of its popularity) during the first half of the sixteenth century, but recent research gives evidence that it was probably translated from a Dutch play, Elckerlijk, some years previously. And Professor H. Logeman, of Ghent, finds that the author of Elckerlijk was Peter of Diest, otherwise Peter Dorland, an historian and theologian of the latter half of the fifteenth century. Some indirect connection may be suspected between our early religious drama and that of France; it is highly interesting to find later this link with Holland of the old school of belief, although nearly contemporary with Erasmus. There is no "Vice" in Every-man, which is another argument for its Dutch origin, that character being essentially English.

Payne Collier calls Every-man "one of the most perfect allegories ever formed," and by general consent it ranks as the best play of its kind; the action is continuous, the meaning clear, and the interest is sustained to the end with growing earnestness. The author, who must have been a serious man and devout Churchman (not necessarily a priest; though he exalts the virtues of the seven sacraments, and the dignity and power of the priesthood, yet he admits that there are sinful priests), shows his intention in the title—"Here begynneth a Treatise how the hye Fader of Heven sendeth Dethe to somon every creature to come and gyve a counte of their lyves in this worlde, and is in maner of a moralle play." Every-man, who represents mankind, comes on the stage as a rich young man singing gaily, he meets Death (arrayed as a skeleton with a large drum), who tells him that God will have a reckoning,—

> Thou must take a long journey,
> Therefore thy book of count with thee thou bring.

Every-man is fearful, and asks his friends to accompany him on his pilgrimage, but Fellowship, Kindred, and Goods (i.e. riches) deny and forsake him. He applies to Good Deeds, but she is weak and cannot stand,—

> Look, the books of your works and deeds eke;
> Behold, how they lie under the feet.

But she begs her sister Knowledge to be his guide. Knowledge brings him to Confession, "that cleansing river," who orders him penance and prayer; these being performed (on the stage), Good Deeds rises up, "now I can walk and go." Putting on the garment of contrition, "three persons of great might"—Beauty, Strength and Discretion—go to help Every-man on his pilgrimage, also Five-wits, ever ready as his counsellors. Thankfully he gives half his goods in alms. Knowledge and Five-wits advise him to go to "priesthood good" for the seven sacraments. Journeying on he arrives at the brink of the grave,—

> For into this cave must I creep,
> And turn to the earth and there to sleep.

One by one his three friends leave him, to his sorrow, followed by Five-wits; Knowledge stays till the end, but Good Deeds endures and his soul is received in heaven with songs of angels—"Thy reckoning is crystal clear."

Given a perfect summer's afternoon, the air still and warm, the simple stage with its three divisions erected on the grey walls of an old Oxford quad., with the green grass before it covered by an informed and sympathetic audience; the admirable and human performance by the actors, heightened by the archaic costumes copied from Flemish tapestries a little older than the play; what wonder that the spectator might dream himself back in the old ages of faith. The wonderful drama of life was before him now as then, and he could understand the spell by which (according to a Wycliffite sermon) under such "pleyinge, men and wymmen, seynge the passioun of Crist and of his seyntis, ben movyd to compassion and devocioun, wepyng bitere teris; thanne thei ben not scornynge of God but worschipyng."

The play has been recently produced in America, and in this month of December again in Oxford. But the spell appears to be broken, and it is chiefly curiosity that haply now attracts. Mr. Bullen has provided a useful edition, modernised for the general reader.

L. TOULMIN SMITH.

TWO PLAYS AND ONE PROBLEM.

I.

PROBABLY both Mr. Barrie and Mr. M'Carthy would demur—and justly—to the use of the word "problem" as descriptive of their plays. Mr. Barrie, indeed, frankly tells us, in large letters, that The Admirable Crichton is a "fantasy," while If I were King is too admirably reminiscent of some of the best dramatic traditions to suggest the "problem-play." Nevertheless, where there is human nature there is problem. It is as inevitable in drama as prose is in conversation; and the interest of both these plays centres on extremely debatable ground. It is odd that in both cases the problem happens to be the same. In no other way do the plays resemble each other. The one is a superficial treatment of an entirely superficial phase of society (if, indeed, it can be said to exist), the other is a play pure and simple, rich in the elemental instincts of human nature; the scene of the one is divided between Mayfair and the Pacific, that of the other is laid in the roistering taverns and the precarious Court of fifteenth century Paris. Yet the situation that forms the main interest of each is the same; roughly speaking, it is the power, or impotence of circumstances to change human love.

The Admirable Crichton is butler in the service of Lord Loam, an eccentric earl who is taken with the notion that the social distinctions in vogue in his household are at bottom artificial. On the strength of his idea he devotes one afternoon a week to the entertainment of his servants by himself, his daughters, and their guests. The situation is capable of being extremely funny, and it is certainly not the actors' fault if it does not quite "come off." No author could wish for better interpreters than Mr. Barrie has in Mr. H. B. Irving, Miss Irene Vanbrugh, Mr. Edward Kemble, and the inimitable impersonator of "Tweeny." At the same time one experiences throughout the piece a sense of balked humour. At the first suggestion of each farcical situation one is prepared for a hearty laugh; then, as the scene comes on, the laugh wears off. All this, however, en passant. Crichton does not share his lordship's views. With an air at once diffident and dogmatic he assures his master that the servants much prefer the conventional régime, since it at least gives them a sanction, each according to his rank, to look down upon his inferiors. This very frank bit of cynicism is borne out (in the play) by the notices to leave which immediately result from his lordship's experiment. But we are anticipating: at the close of one of these weekly scenes, Lord Loam announces that he is about to go on a pleasure trip in his steam yacht, taking with him his daughters—of whom the eldest, Lady Mary, is engaged to Lord Brocklehurst—his nephew, and the Rev. Treherne—who seems to throw up his curacy with a special view to joining the expedition. At the close of this announcement the earl's memory fails him in trying to recall a quotation, and he is borne somewhat boisterously off the stage between his nephew and Crichton. One feels that such a gratuitous indication of mental weakness cannot be other than painful. It is a poor wit that seeks to excite laughter by an exhibition of human weakness.

There is not the slightest need for labelling his lordship "mad." The "eccentricity" is patent from the first, and it need not be more than "eccentricity." As it is, the scene strikes a false note. It may be said that the piece is written merely to amuse; that may be so. At the same time an impression is created both that all attempts to bridge the gulf between masters and servants arise from mental aberration, and that consequently such can only take the form of superficial and eccentric experiments. This seems to put the balance on the wrong side. The matter would be different if Society showed itself more solicitous for the welfare of its servants than it does. As it is, not only in Mayfair, but much more among the middle classes, forming the majority in Mr. Barrie's audiences, masters and mistresses exhibit a callousness towards those who serve them that is simply appalling. At the same time there are, here and there, notable—and successful—exceptions, and these exceptions are neither characterised by madness nor by the idea that the only nexus between class and class is five o'clock tea in the drawing-room once a week.

But the main interest of the piece, as has been said, lies in another direction—in the individual destinies of Crichton and Lady Mary. To resume the story: On the eve of the voyage, Lord Loam's valet and Lady Mary's maid give notice to leave. Crichton comes forward to take the place of the one, and suggests that "Tweeny" should supply that of the other. Crichton and "Tweeny" are not "keeping company," but he confesses to having "had an eye on her," and airs a comical notion that by lowering his own position and raising hers "the young woman may be in a position to permanently improve her condition." At the last moment Lady Mary's lover, Lord Brocklehurst, decides to remain at home. The party embarks, and is shipwrecked on an unknown island in the Pacific.

Here all is changed. The real natures of the several survivors gradually assert themselves. Crichton, removed from his servile element, becomes a man; and, by virtue of his resource and capacity for work, is known among the little band as the "Gov." Lady Mary—no longer "steeped in golden languors"—rivals her sisters in the rôle of Diana. The Earl becomes alternately drudge of the party and "comic man," and the only person to remain unchanged is "Tweeny." These relations continue for two years, every day adding something to the strength of Crichton's position, and bringing out his great qualities. Lady Mary perceives these, and becomes the most devoted of the four girls who look up to Crichton as their master. He, on his part, becomes daily more enamoured of her ladyship, to the great discomfort of poor little Tweeny. The love-making is serious enough, and in it Mr. Irving makes us forget the grotesque surroundings in a passage of singular fineness. Crichton, as lord of the island, wins his suit, and the services of the shipwrecked curate are already requisitioned, when the chance vessel, whose arrival they have been expecting these two years, appears in sight. Crichton has a contrivance by which beacons can be instantaneously lighted all over the island. There is a dramatic moment while the lovers hesitate to use the signal, divided between their dawning happiness and their duty to the rest. Crichton, however, only falters a moment. The hesitation is overcome. The beacons flare up. The ship sends off boats, and the party is rescued.

At no point is the acting more clever than when, at the conclusion of this third act, the curtain falls on Crichton relapsing into his old servile attitude. The last act takes us back to Mayfair. Again, the possibilities of the situation are ludicrous in the extreme, but what of the lovers? All the new-found manliness has vanished from Crichton; he is again the obsequious butler. Lady Mary, though in some respects permanently altered, resumes the old relations with Lord Brocklehurst, her only stipulation with the old earl being that she shall tell her lover of the incident on the island. She is about to do so when Brocklehurst makes confession to her of a similar, though aggravated, lapse. She is delighted to find he is "not perfect," and the fact seems to set her mind at rest about her own past. So these two persons, both subjects of a misalliance, skip contentedly off the stage together, while the Admirable Crichton marries Tweeny, and they take "the public-house at the corner."

All this seems to give nothing whatever to the individual. The force of circumstances is admittedly great, prospects and purposes largely take their hue from their surroundings; but are we to infer, as the play certainly leads us to, that the individual is merely a reflection of circumstances? That our individuality is only skin-deep, while our conventions are the very root and soul of us? Surely this is, to say the least, a very unfair balance of the forces so represented! Here are a man and women who, under certain circumstances which bring out their real selves, win each other's love—no passing lightness of a summer's day, but a love based on a rare insight into and respect for each other's qualities. Again, a love which is not merely respect and mutual dependence, but is as passionate and elemental as love can be. Whether it is possible, under any circumstances, for such love to be elicited from a man and woman previously occupying such different spheres is a matter we leave aside. That it is so is the fact, and the central fact of the play.

The circumstances again alter, and, heigh presto! the individuality collapses, the love vanishes, and these two passionate souls take their places among the rest of the furniture of the house in Mayfair! True, it is all part of a fantasy, but a fantasy need not travesty human nature; nay, the most glorious fantasies ever written owe their immortality to their veracity, as the charm of Miranda and Hermia testifies. We must see next week what light Mr. M'Carthy throws on the problem.

WINTER SONG.

Out in the fields the little lambs are bleating,
Out in the cold and dreary night;
Though all around the angry winds are beating,
No stars look down with heavenly light.

Sleep! Sleep! Sleep!
Into the fold now creep—
The shadows are falling,
The shepherd is calling,
Come home, little lambs, and sleep!

Out in the world my little lamb is straying,
Out in the cold and stormy blast;
Her feet are torn, her little hands are praying,
Praying to God for rest at last.

Sleep! Sleep! Sleep!
Into the fold now creep—
These arms shall caress thee,
This heart still shall bless thee,
Come home, little lamb, and sleep!

A FANCY FROM AN ITALIAN GARDEN.

I HAVE a friend who delights in Italian gardens, and will talk of them for ever. He has a theory that in spite of the many features that all Italian gardens have in common, each one has a soul apart. They all have the conventional terraces, statues, fountains, cypresses, with a luxuriant growth kept only just on this side of untidiness, but each has its own secret only to be learnt by long and loving study. "Take, for instance," he said, "the Trevisi garden at Ladegna. I went to Ladegna once for a week, to that little inn by the river, and the week became six. There were few days when I was not in the Trevisi garden. I would stand under those giant cypresses that delighted Goethe, would watch the humming-bird moths skimming over the rich tangle of brilliant autumn flowers, or mount leisurely from terrace to terrace, at each level attaining a still more superb prospect, till at last the great upper walk gave the best of all. The city, with its delicate towers, the vast plain, with its endless festoons of vine, the mountains, from snowy peak to the dark spur running into the gay fertile level, the swift-swirling river, all these bathed in changing light and colour more beautiful than any dream, gave endless delight.

By degrees I noticed that I was not the only faithful haunter of the garden. The other was a thin, shabby man with a timid, deprecating glance; he passed me silently at first with a profound bow, then gradually we began to exchange a few words about the weather and the garden. Once I asked the gardener who he was. "That," said he, "is old Pòvoli; he hasn't all his wits, but once he pulled the Count's son away from a frightened horse that was dashing along the street, and since then Pòvoli is in clover. He has a little cottage on a level with the highest terrace, and the key of a small door in the wall, and he moons about the garden night and day. He wants nothing beyond the garden."

I think it was on that very day I made a new discovery. At the end of one of the countless paths that led from terrace to terrace, or sometimes stopped abruptly. I noticed a rude grotto. When my eyes had become used to the half darkness I saw at the farther end a simple stone figure of Madonna and her child, the latter a little beyond babyhood. In what seemed almost startling contrast, near them stood the gayest, most pagan little faun imaginable, capering and playing on his noiseless pipes. As I looked, Pòvoli came behind me. "Ah!" he said, "you have found them at last, then." "Who hid them away here?" I asked him. "Who hid them? Why, Signore, they hide themselves. Madonna waits there always; but when the sun sets and the moon rises the little Jesus and the faun they run and play in the garden. I have seen them often. They mind me no more than the wild things mind them. At one time the little faun would tease the butterflies, and scare the lizards till their tails dropped off; but then the little Jesus would be sad, and run away and play no more that night. Now they care for the wild things, and when they run back in the dawning, Madonna gathers them both in her kind arms and kisses the faun before he goes back to his pipes and his dance. I have seen them often, often."

From that time on to my fancy the garden was full of those children and their play. I read the garden afresh in the light of its secret. Several months later I came again. It was in February; the sunshine was gone, the clouds had rolled down from the mountains and sullenly blotted out the plain, giving here and there a glimpse of black withered vines. The gardener met me with a sad face. "Old Pòvoli is dead," he said. "Who would think I should miss him so much, a poor old fellow wanting his wits? But I was used to him, and I miss him. I doubt, too, if all goes well with him now; he never liked the priests." I tried to skirt round this dangerous subject by suggesting that the good God might have found some corner in his universe where there should be a garden for old Pòvoli, and where the priests would have no excuse to meddle. Then I went up the terraces and stood alone by the grotto. The little Jesus was still nestling in his mother's arms, and the faun was filling the air with his silent music.

ST. FRANCIS AND ST. DOMINIC.

SIR,—If St. Francis was a man worthy of all the praise which Protestant admirers of to-day accord him—and in my poor opinion he well deserves it—then I am sure he would be ill-pleased to have his friend Dominic made use of as a dark background to bring out his own superior glory. Your reviewer writes:—"The more the real character of St. Francis impresses itself upon the imagination the less we are attracted by St. Dominic." It was not so with Dante, who lived near to their time, and could appreciate their real characters better than we can, we men of a far-off day and of alien modes of thought and faith.

The one was all seraphical in ardour;
The other by his wisdom upon earth
A splendour was of light cherubical.
One will I speak of, for of both is spoken
In praising one, whichever may be taken,
Because unto one end their labours were.*

We do not indeed know so much of Dominic, and there is not the romance in his life which makes of Francis so attractive a figure. But your reviewer is, I think, mistaken in supposing that a critical study of the sources of Dominic's life would yield but "a very shadowy figure." I have no means of reinvestigating the authorities here, but I know there does exist more than one story of Dominic's life, written by a contemporary; and I know that they do not suggest that he was a "Spanish grandee, courtly but hard." The first incident told of him is that as a student he (who afterwards founded an order devoted to learning) sold all his books in a time of famine to feed the poor. As to the funny miracle of the cock, it is the first time I have heard tell of it, and I suspect it comes from one of the always discredited apocryphal lives written two centuries after the saint's death.

But I am writing at a disadvantage, dependent on my memory of what I read thirty years ago for my facts. One fact, however, there is which belongs not to hagiography but to history. St. Dominic in his lifetime won to himself hundreds, it is said—and probably said truly—thousands, of devoted disciples; men who first gave up all they possessed, and then gave themselves to preaching and study with no other compensation than the opportunity offered for the first time of combining with these pursuits a true monk's life of obedience, penance, and prayer. Could a "Spanish grandee" do so much even by courtliest manners? Could he have been so wanting in "quick human feeling" who so won men to him? or "had no democratic spirit," who devised a rule for his order based on the principle of manhood suffrage?

I would not say a word to check the wholesome cult of St. Francis, the lover of poverty, in this money-making age; but do not let us try to exalt him by defaming his brother in the spirit.

UNBAPTISED CHILDREN.

SIR,—In your Provincial Letter last week (Dec. 6) occurs the statement:—". . . it is to this day a heresy according to the teaching of the State Church to say that an unbaptised child can possibly be admitted to heaven." Is this true? I have passed through four Anglican colleges, but not once has it been pointed out to me where such teaching might be found in Church of England documents. I have always understood that such teaching was opposed by the Prayer-book. At the end of the office of Baptism the first rubric reads:—"It is certain by God's Word that children which are baptised, dying before they commit actual sin, are undoubtedly saved." It is drawn from a declaration put out in 1536, and published in "The Institution of a Christian Man" in 1537. It is to be noted that in its original form it added the words "and otherwise not." The omission of these words from the Prayer-book is not accidental, but with the set purpose of opposing this doctrine.

With reference to the rubric at the beginning of the Burial Service, Archbishop Whately says, "Not that the Church determines anything concerning the future state of those that depart before they are admitted to Baptism; but since they have not been received within the pale of the Church, we cannot probably use an office at their funeral, which all along supposes the person that is buried to have died in her communion." As an Anglican I had occasion to bury unbaptised persons, and always used another form of service, and this with authority. E. A. MALEY.

THE EDUCATION BILL.

SIR,—You express surprise that Liberal Unionists can view the Education Bill with even moderate satisfaction.

As I have taken no part in politics for several years, and decline to be labelled as of any party, I am not competent to reply in the name of a Liberal Unionist, but I can state why one, who has taken great interest and done some work in educational matters for a long series of years, does view the Bill with moderate satisfaction.

Not certainly because I am blind to its shortcomings, but because in my opinion it will be a great improvement on the present state of things, and because I can see no probability of a better measure being passed through Parliament for many a long year, till the time indeed when the Liberal party has a commanding majority in the House of Commons, without the assistance of the Irish members. As an Educationist I infinitely prefer to take the present instalment of the desirable rather than to wait for that far-off time.

Of course, in the present condition of public feeling it is a bold thing to name this Bill "an instalment of the desirable," but I infinitely prefer an absolute support from the rates and taxes, plus a management committee, to a three-quarter support from the taxes, with the clergyman in sole possession.

And now, Sir, a few reasons for my "moderate satisfaction." Speaking generally of the non-provided schools—

The buildings, the accessories, the equipment will be greatly improved.

The teaching staff will not be "starved," and there will be money to pay for certificated teachers instead of for No. 68's and pupil-teachers. Indirectly the profession will be greatly benefited.

Whereas at present there are no Nonconformists on the staff, in the future they may be there, and have a chance of qualifying themselves for the highest positions, with the probable result that a far larger proportion of head-masterships in provided schools will be held by Nonconformists than is at present the case.

The clergyman is now absolutely the master of the school and of the teachers. In the future he will be one of many. The lay managers will cease to be "dummies," as they must attend the meetings, and they will have their appetite for work greatly sharpened by the presence of the representatives of the local authorities. The influence of these will be out of all proportion to their number, seeing that on their report (to a great extent) will depend the pecuniary assistance received.

The parents' interest in the education of their children will be quickened by their having to pay a rate on its behalf. The ordinary ratepayer's objection to a School Board has not been to the "Godless Education," but to the rate which he knew must accompany it.

I confidently look forward to the time when the non-provided school will be a thing of the past. It is the clergyman of the parish with generally only a very few of the wealthy laity who have kept up the necessary subscriptions for the Voluntary school. In the future the sense of proprietorship, so dear to the ordinary cleric, will have departed, the wealthy laity before-mentioned will find themselves heavily rated, and when the value of the denominational education has to be placed in the balance against the necessity of a very heavy subscription for repairs and maintenance, I have no doubt which scale will kick the beam.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

CHRISTMAS APPEALS.

London: Bell-street Mission.—The Rev. B. Kirkman Gray sends an appeal for the Poor's Purse, Christmas entertainments, &c, for which donations should be sent to the Rev. G. Dawes Hicks, 7, Highbury-grange, N. Gifts of clothes, toys, &c, should be sent to the Hall, Bell-street, Edgware-road.

London: Bermondsey.—The Rev. Eustace Thompson sends us the following Sunday-school appeal:—"Last year Mr. Tarrant asked for help in providing prizes and for the usual Christmas party for our Sunday-school, and his appeal was generously met. The charge of the work being now committed to me, may I beg for similar aid this year? We estimate that some £5 will be required, and contributions sent to me (or to the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, 4, Geraldine-road, Wandsworth, S.W.) will be gratefully acknowledged.—Eustace Thompson, 47, Upper Grange-road, Bermondsey."

London: Forest Gate.—The Rev. H. W. Perris writes:—"We do not rank as a 'Mission' at Upton-lane; and yet I doubt whether the needs of any district are more acute and pressing than ours. West Ham is steeped in the direst poverty; our School Board teachers encounter it daily Miss Heaviside, who visits in the Tidal Basin and Custom House district as a sanitary inspectress, is sadly troubled by what she sees and hears. If we had it in our power to do our share in the work of discriminating relief our cause might be more sensibly advanced than by many controversial lectures and pamphlets. May I appeal for help? We have come to the end of our slender resources. A small committee has been formed. Gifts of clothing, &c., may be sent to Mr. White (Drew-road Board School, Silvertown, E.), 45, Bolton-road; or to the Rev. Henry Woods Perris, 87, Chestnut-avenue, Forest Gate, E."

Manchester: Goulden-street (Ministry to the Poor).—The Rev. B. Walker will be glad to send a copy of the printed report of his work during the past year to anyone who may wish to see it, and appeals for help in his work, in the form either of donations of money or other seasonable gifts for the poor, which may be sent to him at 55, Cheetwood-lane, Manchester. Donations may also be sent to Mr. R. D. Darbishire, 1, St. James's-square, Manchester.

Byker.—A Sale of Work in aid of the building fund was held last Saturday, and the result exceeded the expectations of the promoters. There was a numerous company at the opening ceremony, at which Councillor Affleck, of Gateshead, presided. The sale was opened by Mrs. Tweedy, to whom a vote of thanks was moved by the Rev. Frank Walters.

Chorley.—Sir William Henry Tate, Bart., of Liverpool, has presented a new organ to the chapel, in memory of his father, Sir Henry Tate, and of his grandfather, the Rev. William Tate, who for thirty-seven years (1799-1836) was minister of the chapel. At the opening Mr. Hugh Taylor presided at the organ, and an address of grateful acknowledgment was made by the Rev. A. Doel.

Clifton.—A recent series of sermons by the Rev. Dr. Warschauer, in Oakfield-road Church, on "Did Jesus Claim to be God?" effectually replying to the Rev. J. Moffat Logan on the subject of an address which Dr. Warschauer had given by invitation to the Old King-street (Baptist) Discussion Class, has been issued as a penny pamphlet, printed by Taylor Bros., Broad Weir, Bristol, and in addition to matters of purely local interest contains some forcible doctrinal statements.

Derby.—The biennial bazaar in aid of the Friar-gate Chapel was opened on Thursday week by the Mayor (the Hon. F. Strutt), and the total receipts up to Saturday morning amounted to £121. The Rev. J. Birks, in an opening statement, said that they hoped to raise £200. The Mayor, in his address, referred to the long connection of his family with the chapel, and also to Dr. Martineau's constant attendance there while in Derby.

Guildford.—The preacher on Dec. 14, when the collection for the B. and F.U.A. was taken, was the Rev. G. Lansdown, of Billingshurst, who made a forcible plea on behalf of the Association.

Heaton Moor.—The guild has held frequent interesting meetings for the transaction of business, the study of English History, and the reading of good literature. A lantern entertainment for children was very successful in bringing together the young people from the new houses in the immediate neighbourhood; it was arranged and managed by the guild, which has other plans under consideration for the benefit of the district. The Social Evenings Committee has arranged several meetings, including that at which Mr. John Harwood recited Dickens's "Christmas Carol," with his usual remarkable ability, on Dec. 10, when the school-church was well filled.

Ipswich.—On the invitation of the Chairman of the Public Art Gallery and School, the Rev. L. Tavener has delivered three lectures on "Watts," "Constable," and "The History of the Royal Academy" respectively, all of which were largely attended and warmly appreciated, the audience including some of the leading men of the town. Mr. Tavener dealt with his subjects from a high point of view and with real insight. The invitation to give these lectures was a welcome recognition of his gifts, much appreciated by his congregation.

Kendal.—The congregation having decided a month ago to purchase a new piano for the schoolroom, several friends agreed together to advance the needed sum on loan, so that the instrument might be secured at once and on the best terms. This was done, but the loan was not required, for a Rummage Sale, organised to raise part of the amount, was so unexpectedly successful last Saturday as to clear £23 10s. in a very short time, and this, with £7 10s. already raised by entertainments, &c, more than paid for the piano. Miss Katherine E. Mills, daughter of the Rev. H. V. Mills, was last week appointed librarian to the Kendal Literary and Scientific Society.

London: Wandsworth.—At the "Winter Festival" of the Band of Hope on Monday, Mr. P. H. Thomas moved, Mrs. Tarrant seconded, and it was resolved by a silent standing vote of the whole audience—"That this meeting of officers, parents, friends, and children connected with the Wandsworth Unity Band of Hope desires to express its deep regret at the death of Mr. G. H. Dyer, and its great esteem for his character and free public services in several forms of benevolent and philanthropical activity. The meeting also wishes to offer its respectful condolences to Mrs. Dyer and her daughters in their heavy bereavement." The late Mr. Dyer and his family have been for many years invaluable workers in the Sunday-school and allied institutions. He died suddenly, Nov. 28.

Manchester: Longsight.—On Saturday, Dec. 13, a successful Sale of Work was held in the Gaskell Hall, under the auspices of the Ladies' Church Aid Society. Mr. John Heys presided, and the Sale of Work was opened by the minister (the Rev. H. J. Rossington, M.A). The proceeds amounted to about £37.

Manchester: Upper Brook-street.—The Rev. C. Peach having recently tendered his resignation of the pulpit, and having found himself unable to withdraw it at the request of the committee, a deputation waited upon him, consisting of Councillor Pritchard, J.P., Councillor Marsden, and Mr. H. Woodhead, after which a general meeting of the congregation was called for Wednesday, the 10th inst. A large and representative gathering assembled, and resolved, without dissent, to assure Mr. Peach of their entire confidence in him and his ministry, and of their earnest desire that he should withdraw his resignation. Mr. Peach has since, in a circular letter to the congregation, expressed his sense of the kindness of the congregation in desiring him to stay, and has heartily acceded to their request.

Northampton (Appointment).—At a meeting o the subscribers of the Kettering-road Church, held on Sunday evening last, it was decided to invite the Rev. Arthur Harvie, of Gateshead, to become the minister of the congregation. Mr. Harvie has accepted the invitation, and will enter upon his ministerial duties on the first Sunday in February.

Portsmouth: High-street.—A lantern lecture was recently given in the chapel by an orthodox friend—Mr. L. Dyer—on "A Trip to Norway." The lecture was in aid of the chapel funds, and the views, which were from photographs taken by the lecturer himself, were exceptionally interesting and instructive to the young people present. Last week the ladies of the congregation arranged and carried out a successful Café Chantant, also in aid of the chapel funds. A sale of useful work brought in a welcome little sum, and the girls from the John Pounds Home assisted in the musical arrangements of the evening.

Richmond.—With reference to the announcement made last week, we are asked by Mr. Farrington to say that there has been no formal appointment by the congregation of Mr. Hardy as assistant minister, but that the arrangement is a personal one between the two ministers. The announcement is made by Mr. Farrington in his December Calendar in the following terms:—"I have, this month, the very great pleasure of saying that Mr. Hardy has consented to act as my assistant in the work and in the Sunday services of our church. I hope for the best results from his thoughtfulness, his sincerity, and his fervour on the life of this congregation. That you all recognise these I know; and I am sure of your welcome to him in this relation. May his efforts, joined to the renewed efforts of each member of our fellowship, bring about a deeper sense of the worth of our Liberal Faith, and a wider recognition of it." A most successful Sale of Work was held at the Knoll, adjoining the Free Church, on Thursday, Dec. 11, the proceeds amounting to about £80. As this amount exceeds that realised in any previous year, it is a result that should abundantly encourage the band of lady workers who, during the year, devote so much time and labour to the effort. Special thanks are due to Mr. and Mrs. Farrington for again lending the Knoll for the purpose. In such surroundings the sale could not be other than a pretty one.

Rotherham.—The annual soirée of the Church of Our Father was held on Dec. 10 in the schoolroom, which had been newly decorated and improved with new heating apparatus, gas fittings, platform, &c. After tea a recital was given in the church, and the speeches at the subsequent meeting formed part of a varied programme, the Revs. H. Thomas, J. E. Manning, and J. E. Jenkins being among the speakers. The Rev. W. Stephens stated that the cost of the work done in the schoolroom was altogether £250, of which £114 had been already collected, and he appealed to the congregation to make up the balance. Before the close of the meeting a further £44 had been promised, Mr. W. G. Gummer having begun by offering £25 if the congregation would subscribe a like amount by the end of the year.

Sevenoaks: Bessell's Green.—On Wednesday week, through the kindness of Miss Leigh Browne, the congregation of the Old Meeting House had the pleasure of hearing a very interesting lecture from Mr. Herbert Rix, B.A., on "A Journey to Palestine and Back." It was illustrated by lantern views, and also by costumes which Mrs. Rix and some members of the congregation wore for the occasion, while an appropriate song—"The Holy City"—was fitly rendered by Miss Staples, the picture of Jerusalem being on the screen at the time.

Trowbridge.—On Wednesday evening, Dec. 10, an excellent entertainment was given in the schoolroom of the Conigre Chapel, by the children of the Sunday-school and Band of Hope, which consisted of action songs, choruses (in character), recitations, also violin, mandoline, and pianoforte solos. They were much enjoyed by the large company present. The children were specially trained for the entertainment by Miss L. Walker, who at the close of the programme, was presented by one of the girls with a handsome bouquet. The Rev. J. Wain presided.

Walsall.—On Sunday, Nov. 30, the Church Anniversary services were conducted by the Rev. J. B. Higham, B.A., of Wolverhampton.

Yorkshire Training School of Physical Culture.

The above School was opened more than two years ago with the object of providing a centre in the North of England for the professional training of educated women in the Swedish system of Physical Culture.

The minimum cost is of two years' duration, and includes the Study of Physiology, Anatomy, Hygiene, Chemistry, Elementary Pathology, Theory of Movements, Practical Subjects, as Gymnastics, Fencing, Swimming, Games, &c.

That such a centre is needed seems to be proved by the fact that the first student trained by this School was, on the completion of her course, appointed under the Bradford Board as Instructress on Physical Culture to their schools.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

ON the eve of Christmas these words are written, but they are really our message for New Year's Eve. At the close of another year our strength and confidence are in the Eternal Goodness. To all friends in that great fellowship, the heartiest greetings and good wishes! May the grace of a truer wisdom, a profounder sympathy, a more joyous helpfulness be ours, that THE INQUIRER may prove itself more and more worthy of the confidence and generous support to which it already owes so much.

IN the New Year we propose simply to follow with fresh eagerness and determination the course we have recently pursued—to preserve our wide outlook, to keep in touch with every movement that makes for the progress of truth, the deepening of religious life, the broadening of sympathies, and by every means in our power to be helpful to the growing life of our Free Churches. And we ask the co-operation of friends everywhere, to give us wider opportunities for such helpfulness, to make THE INQUIRER known to others, both within the fellowship of the churches and beyond their borders.

ON Saturday afternoon, Jan. 10, a service will be held in Little Portland-street Chapel, when the memorial to Dr. Martineau will be unveiled. The memorial, which has been executed in white marble by Mr. Hope Pinker, represents a side view of part of the statue of Dr. Martineau, which is in the library of Manchester College, Oxford. Full particulars will be announced next week.

THE Archbishop of Canterbury, whose strength had been visibly failing for some time, as was manifest at the Coronation, and in the last speech he made on the Education Bill in the House of Lords, passed peacefully away at Lambeth Palace on Tuesday morning. Dr. Temple was eighty-one years old. A Balliol man, where he was the contemporary of Jowett and Stanley, he was known in early life, and as Headmaster of Rugby, as a strong Liberal. He was the author of the first essay in "Essays and Reviews," and when Gladstone, in 1869, made him Bishop of Exeter there was a great outcry. A man of decided character and of great powers of work, he quickly won the respect, if not the affection, of his clergy, and subsequently as Bishop of London, and since 1896 as Archbishop, he rendered conspicuous services to the Church. "Temple is a beast—but he is a just beast," said a Rugby boy in a letter home long ago. Many of his clergy have doubtless said the same since then, but beneath the rugged exterior there was a heart of the truest sympathy.

To the sixth volume of the supplemental series (Vol. XXX. of the whole work) of the Encyclopædia Britannica, Dr. Fairbairn, Principal of Mansfield College, Oxford, has contributed the article on Dr. Martineau, illustrated by a not very happy reproduction of the well-known photograph by Elliott and Fry, which appears also in the recently published "Life." "The nineteenth century," Dr. Fairbairn writes, "had no more reverent thinker than Martineau; the awe of the Eternal was the very atmosphere that he breathed, and he looked at man with the compassion of one whose thoughts were full of God." Dr. Fairbairn appears to think that Martineau was greater as a religious teacher than as a philosopher, yet of the volumes of his collected essays it is said :—

> His essays are fine examples of permanent literature appearing in an ephemeral medium, and represent work which has solid worth for later thought as well as for the speculation of their own time. There is hardly a name or a movement in the religious history of the century which he did not touch and illuminate.

Of Martineau's greater works, the "Types of Ethical Theory" and the "Study of Religion," Dr. Fairbairn says that they are unquestionably the work of an old man. Notwithstanding their brilliance and the great wealth of thought they contain, he thinks that finally the material was put together in haste by a mind which had lost its freshness and sense of proportion. But that is a criticism hardly in keeping with the fact that these books were the final elaboration of courses of lectures which had grown with the author's mind, through many years of constant teaching. One other passage from Dr. Fairbairn's article we will quote :—

> The life of Martineau was so essentially the life of a thinker, and was so typical of the century in which he lived, and the society within which he moved, that he can be better understood through his spoken mind than through his outward history. He was a man happy in his ancestry: he inherited the dignity, the reserve, the keen and vivid intellect, and the picturesque imagination of the French Huguenot, though they came to him seasoned and purified by generations of Puritan discipline exercised under the gravest of ecclesiastical disabilities, and of culture maintained in the face of exclusion from academic privileges. He had the sweet and patient temper which knew how to live unrepining and unsoured in the midst of the most watchful persecution, public and private; and it is wonderful how rarely he used his splendid rhetoric for the purposes of invective against the spirit and policy from which he must have suffered deeply.

MR. HERBERT RIX is about to publish a volume entitled "A Faith for To-day," the chief aim of it being to set forth in a popular manner the religious implications of the organic view of the universe. The subject will be treated from the idealistic standpoint. Mr. Rix believes that the intellectual expression of religion will in future years be found in this direction. The volume will be published very shortly by Messrs. Williams andNorgate.

THERE are not a few readers who believe that George Eliot gets far less attention and recognition at the present day than her writings merit, and they look with confidence to a return of her popularity and influence. That will hardly be brought about, however, by researches into the originals of her characters such as are promised for the new volume of the Leisure Hour. As far as one writer is indebted to another, as Bulwer-Lytton was indebted to Scott, or George Eliot to the precedent work of Mrs Gaskell, it is interesting enough to trace the connection; but to take the created characters of an author and to compel them to masquerade as real persons, to compel Dinah Morris, for instance, to belittle herself to the measure of some historical young woman who did preach to sinners, but who by-and-by got married and gave over preaching, is not to assist the original aim of the author, but to invert that aim. The author hearing somewhere a snatch of melody composed a great piece of music, why insist on not only reverting to the bald original theme, but even presenting a photograph of the original common-place individual who whistled it? The writer of this note heard a lecture in which Hamlet was clothed in the robes of the Earl of Essex. O, what a falling-off was there! What a heavenly release it was to think that, the lecture once over, one could go back and see Hamlet in his habit as he lived, not in the court of Elizabeth, but in the imagination of William Shakespeare! Save us from realising George Eliot's characters. Uncle Tom of cabin fame has been subject to that sort of treatment ad lib., and it was hardly good enough even for him.

WHAT is the proper punctuation of the Lord's Prayer? The earliest English Book of Common Prayer (the first Prayer-book of Edward VI.) printed the third petition as follows:—"Thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven." The schedule to the Act of Uniformity introduced a comma after the word "earth," and this usage has been followed by all editions of the Prayer-book until very lately. The new editions, however, which were issued in consequence of the accession of King Edward VII., have a comma after "done," and none after "earth." The intention behind this change is evidently to make "as in heaven, so on earth," a conclusion common to the three preceding petitions —"Hallowed be thy name," "Thy kingdom come," "Thy will be done." There seems to be no evidence that this interpretation was current in the ancient Church; but, on the other hand, it is quite consistent with the Greek, it was accepted in the seventeenth century by Bishop Andrewes, it is implied in the Catechism which forms part of the Book of Common Prayer, and in itself it seems preferable to the other reading. We have examined the books of common prayer which are most in use among our own churches, and all that we have seen, from the Ten Services down to the Guilds Union Manual, print the version in which "as in heaven, so on earth," is attached exclusively to "Thy will be done." If the other punctuation is adopted in any new liturgy it would be well to make the articulation perfectly clear by separating the three conjoint petitions with commas alone, and the rest by full stops, thus:—"Our Father, Which art in heaven; Hallowed be thy name, Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done, On earth as in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread." And so on to the end.

IN our issue of Sept. 27, we published an interesting letter in which the connection of Philip James Bailey, the author of "Festus," with the High Pavement Chapel, Nottingham, was shown. An article has since appeared in the Swedenborgian paper Morning Light, of Nov. 8, which seems to put it beyond dispute that the poet was an avowed Unitarian, and actually felt constrained to change the early editions of his work in order to bring them into harmony with his later religious thought. Mr. Alfred Beilby, the writer of the article, says: "The poem has undergone considerable theological revision during the past fifty years, the author (as he himself told me) having gradually moved from a Trinitarian to a Unitarian position. In response to my question, he stated that he could not accept, although he had given it careful thought, the doctrine of the divinity of the Lord." It is important to preserve this definite testimony as to the religious message which the poet wished to convey to the world.

HUNGARIAN LETTER.

IT is very pleasant to hear that English people have been enabled lately to learn a good deal about Hungary from careful students and personal observers of our life and work over here. I am referring to Miss Györy, the Hungarian lady who has been lecturing in England since the beginning of the summer, and also to Mr. Shrubsole, who is a regular apostle of everything Hungarian.

Still I hope that your readers will accept a few words from your old correspondent. Let me first of all mention a great event, the erection of an equestrian statue of King Matthias, in the central square of Kolozsvár. No other statue in Hungary can be compared with this. With some pardonable native pride I may say that it could well stand comparison with most of the great European monuments, for though there are several on a grander scale, such as the Albert Memorial and others in England, France, Italy and Germany, yet this at Kolozsvár is carried out with skill and effectiveness rarely equalled. You will, perhaps, know from the history of our country that King Matthias in the second half of the fifteenth century made Hungary extremely powerful. Austria, Bohemia, Venice, and several other countries were subjected to Hungary then, and even Germany was her tributary. This king, however, was powerful not only on the battlefield, but perhaps much more so on the field of science, high culture and human institutions. He was, and is still called, "Matthias the Just," because he sincerely favoured the people and demanded justice for them by every means. Hungary never was more powerful before or since. The Hungarian royal court was a meeting-place of the most powerful monarchs of Europe. At that time it was a great thing for royal emissaries of other States to be able to speak Hungarian.

Now the problem set before the artist was to express all this and make it intelligible to the most simple men. And our artist, John Fadrusz, has been happy in his solution of the problem. The king, sitting on horseback, appears on a rampart of his castle looking out over the country. The expression on his face is of quiet and satisfaction. Clearly he has all the power a king requires, all the love a nation can tender to a monarch. Grouped below, at the foot of the rampart, are his officers, telling of battles won. Flags taken from the enemy are drooped before the king. Four heroes, each one a pure Hungarian, strong, valiant and happy, present to him their acquisitions on the field. In them one sees the best type of the old Hungarian character. With such men it was easy to gain success. Here the whole independence of Hungary is clearly presented, and one is impelled to the remark that to whom such past was possible an equally great future may be yet in store.

Thousands of people were present at the unveiling ceremony, and since then Kolozsvár has been a place of pilgrimage.

I may refer also to a specially Unitarian event. The annual gathering of Unitarians took place on the 25th and the following days of October. First the meeting of the ministers was held, Bishop Ferencz in the chair. Two valuable papers were read, one on the "Present Situation of the Unitarian Church towards other Churches in the Country, and What is the Ministers' Duty?" on which a lively discussion ensued. Though it was stated by several ministers that the attack of the Roman Catholic Church on all other Churches, and ours among the rest, is very severe, we have no serious reason to be afraid of our future. The general experience of the ministers is that our people take a great interest in Church-life. They are ready to make sacrifices, and are always prepared to defend their faith. The subject of the second was our "Sunday-schools and How to Make them More Flourishing." From several reports and speeches one saw that this work is considered very useful, but the result of the teaching is very unequal in the different churches. It varies according to the zeal of them inisters. With us the minister is the sole teacher. He takes all the pupils in one class. This autumn my pupils, the theological students, have tried to distribute their pupils into several classes, and it is found to answer very well. I hope this may lead to the introduction of the same plan into the country congregations also.

The David Association assembled the same day, in the afternoon, when the general meeting was held under the presidency of Baron Horváth. His presidential address was quite an event. He surveyed the position of Unitarianism in the past, and liberalism in the different Churches to-day. He was able to point out some very good signs of progress among the Protestant Churches, and especially in their lay-leaders.

Let me make mention of the movement begun by our women for the promotion of a more intense religious life in our congregations. A new paper is being brought out for them by the David Association, which proves that some of our women are quite able writers and zealous supporters of Unitarian principles. A lady from Budapest, Mrs. Perezel, read a very clever paper on the work of Unitarian women. She showed how our women, chiefly the ministers' wives, ought to carry on their mission work in the congregations, and how they ought to become leaders of the country women.

After this the annual meeting of the Chief Consistory was held. A large gathering, especially of ministers, was present. One of the topics under discussion was the Rules of the Ministers' Stipend Fund. It was decided that with Budapest as a centre, a new district should be formed under the superintendence of a dean. Within the last few days Bishop Ferencz has carried this plan out, and the Rev. N. Józan is appointed the first dean.

It will be interesting to notice here that last summer a considerable congregation was formed near the River Tisza, on the plain of Hungary. The new Unitarians are mostly well-to-do farmers, who are able to support a teacher. This congregation is very promising. It is quite probable that others will follow them very soon.

TWO PLAYS AND ONE PROBLEM.

II.

THOSE who have read Stevenson's essay on François Villon (Familiar Studies of Men and Books) will need no introduction to the hero of the play which has had such deserved success at St. James's this autumn, and which the author, Mr. J. H. M'Carthy, has issued to a still wider public in the form of a story. For the sake of those, however, who have yet to make the hero's acquaintance, the story may be briefly outlined as follows :—

Villon, poet, scholar, and vagrant, passing his time between taverns and street brawls—the scene is Paris in the fifteenth century—falls in love with the Lady Katherine de Vaucelles. Without a single friend at Court his case seems hopeless, but one night as he and his boon companions are roistering at the Fircone —surely the most delightful of all taverns, save the one in "Eastcheap"!—her ladyship herself appears and begs him, on the strength of a letter he has written her, to do her a service. This is nothing less than to rid the earth of the Grand Constable of France. It was a strong line for a lady to take, no doubt, but in the fifteenth century ladies did occasionally take a strong line, not without good reason. As may be imagined, Villon eagerly undertakes the lady's cause. He confronts the Grand Constable, who chances to be present, and forces a quarrel with him. They fight, Thibaut falls, the Imperial Guard break in, Villon is taken prisoner.

But it so happens that Louis XI., that whimsical and cynical monarch, so ably impersonated by Mr. Charles Fulton, is also present at the Fircone, in disguise, of course. He has overheard all that has passed between Lady Katherine and Villon, and, earlier in the evening, has listened to Villon singing his song: "If I were King."

> Far otherwise our Fatherland,
> If Villon were the King of France.

It strikes Louis' fancy to put this boast to the test, so he orders Villon to be drugged and removed from his dungeon to the palace, where the quarters so lately occupied by the Grand Constable are assigned him. In fact, he is informed on waking that he is now Grand Constable himself, and second only in power to the monarch. Villon has not much time for bewilderment. His first duty is to try the roisterers who were captured along with him on the previous night. The scene that ensues is one of the best in the play, and excellently brings out the really fine nature of François Villon. Thereafter Louis acquaints his sham Constable with the true state of affairs; Villon is to enjoy his present position for a week; if at the end of it he succeeds in winning the hand of Katherine de Vaucelles, he is a free man; if he does not he is to hang for the (supposed) murder of Thibaut. A week is not long for the purpose, but this particular week is crammed with dramatic incident. Paris is in a state of siege. The Duke of Burgundy has invested the city with a powerful army. Louis is utterly unfitted to redeem the situation. It is this which gives point to the song, whose strains never leave us throughout the play:

> We want a chief to bear the brand,
> And bid the damned Burgundians dance;
> God! where the Oriflamme should stand
> If Villon were the King of France!

Villon determines to head a sortie on the besiegers. Meantime the week has been rich in opportunities for winning favour in the eyes of the fair Katherine, and he is not without evident tokens that fortune has favoured his suit. But it must be understood that all this time he has been disguised, and so well disguised that not even his boon companions have recognised him. Now, however, he feels that he cannot, as an honest man, ask her ladyship's hand without revealing his identity. Despite the King's cynical dissuasion he does so. The discovery proves a great shock to Katherine's pride, and on the eve of the battle she turns from him unable to reconcile herself to the François Villon who has suddenly taken the place of her admired Lord Montcorbier. Villon finds himself, as many another honest man has found himself before and since, in despair.

However, there is the welcome work of "bidding the Burgundians dance." Villon heads the army, defeats Burgundy, and re-enters the city amid public rejoicing. Alas! the first object that catches his eye is a mighty gallows before which King and Court are assembled. The week has run out. Doffing helm and sword, Villon, as Grand Constable, passes sentence on himself. There is a moment of breathless silence while he undisguises himself; then the storm bursts. All Paris is assembled. They will not let their hero and the saviour of their city perish thus. They clamour for justice. Louis replies by cynically asking who among them, since all are so eager that Villon should be spared, is willing to die for him. Immediately the crowds fall back and there is silence. One would like to dwell on the great qualities of this scene did space permit. The attitude of the crowd is an excellent antithesis for what is about to follow. It is only a really dramatic instinct that could seize on the profound bearing of a situation brought about by half-a-dozen words. It yields us average human nature as a dramatic background for human nature at its best. It is the kind of thing we constantly find in Shakespeare and Dumas, but how rarely in the productions of to-day! There is nothing derogatory to human nature in this shrinking of the crowd from Louis' demand. A people may feel that an act of grave injustice is being done their favourite without any one of them being thereby moved to die in his place. No man whose nature is not warped would see anything unworthy in such an attitude. At the same time, our nature is capable of something higher than this. It is significant that the old saying is not: If a man love his friend he will lay down his life for him, but "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man should lay down his life for his friend." In the scene before us the instinct of justice is the precursor of the instinct of love.

The King's demand rings out again and again from the lips of the herald. A response arises. It is from a poor, tottering old woman; she is Villon's mother. She will die for him. It is not to be. A man for a man are the King's terms. Suddenly from the adjoining church, whence a solemn music heightens the sense of tragedy in the crowded square, comes Katherine de Vaucelles. She hears the herald's proclamation. She sees Villon—Villon of the tavern—Villon, who, from simple love of her, gave his life to rid her of her villainous wooer. She has learned to love him under a very different guise, but it is him she loves for all that:—

> "I will die for him, Sire," she said, quietly.

This is enough. It does not end the scene, for the week has gone, and Villon's salvation turns after all on his chancing to work on the King's sense of superstition. One is loth to qualify by a single word the admiration which this play so justly excites, but it seems a pity—so far as unity of motif is concerned—that there should be this double thread of love and superstition running through it. Obviously, as by the King's terms the week was bound to expire before Villon could be brought to the gallows, and, therefore, before Lady Katherine's love could be put to this dramatic test, the mere revelation of her love could not save him without greatly modifying the dramatic power of the situation. One would not for worlds forego the gallows scene, but one wishes that Villon's fate could have turned wholly on the fact that scene reveals. It is idle, however, to wish for an incompatible combination. Let us rather take the fact as it is, and contrast it—according to the purpose of this notice—with Mr. Barrie's treatment of the same problem noticed last week. The problem is the power, or impotence, of circumstances to change love. Circumstance is given fully as prominent a place in Mr. M'Carthy's play as in Mr. Barrie's fantasy. Lady Katherine's love is put to the same kind of test as occurs in the case of Lady Mary Lasenby. Lady Katherine loves the Lord Montcorbier; then it transpires —and on his own confession—that this handsome, daring, resourceful statesman is Villon, the beggar-poet.

Does this complete revolution of circumstance destroy the lady's love, as Crichton's humble circumstances destroyed Lady Mary Lasenby's? For the moment pride comes between, and love suffers eclipse. Nothing could be more natural. No woman could give her heart to the second man in all the realm and not experience a shock when that man suddenly unmasks and discovers the strolling singer. That the shock should occur is proof of the severe test which circumstances impose. Then comes the greater test, of which she has of course previously known nothing; the man is in peril of his life. At the touch of Death the accidents of life vanish. She is woman; he is man. It is not the statesman she has loved; it is the man. Contrary to Mr. Barrie's conclusion, men and women are something besides the clothes they stand up in. Passion is as strong at the gallows as it is in the King's garden—and it is more divine. Yes, circumstances do change love; they purify it, they ennoble it, they make it obedient unto death, as, indeed, was published to the world long ago; but destroy it? make men and women forget they have loved? make them forget that, "spirit to spirit, ghost to ghost," they have dwelt some brief sweet moments amid these shadows? Not while human nature remains, for all its foibles, the divine thing it is, not till the crackle of mephistophelian laughter echoes over a blighted world.

LITERATURE.

DR. HASTINGS' DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE.*

Among the most notable events of the year in the world of books must be reckoned the completion, by the publication of this fourth volume, of Dr. Hastings' "Dictionary of the Bible." In noticing the first volume four years ago, we said that the time for congratulating the editor would come when his great undertaking was completed, and it is a pleasure now to do that most warmly, while we are glad to see that an extra volume is in preparation, which is to contain "Indexes and certain subsidiary articles of importance." What these will be we are not told, but one, or several, we may surmise, will deal with "Other Religions," for in the article Bible in the first volume the section on "the external Relations of the Bible" gave some account of the literature of the religious of China, India, &c., and for "a brief sketch of the religions themselves" referred to the article Religion; but turning now to Religion we find our expectation disappointed, for that article is merely a slight reference by the editor to the meaning of the word. There is, however, a separate article on Zoroastrianism, dealing particularly with the relations of the Persian doctrines of Angels, Demons and the Resurrection to the later Jewish beliefs. We shall be interested also to see whether the extra volume has an article on the Trinity, for which we have looked in vain in this last volume. Incarnation, which is also a word not found in the Bible, is yet the subject of one of the most important articles in the Dictionary, by Dr. Sanday, and in a work which lays special stress on Biblical Theology, we should have expected from the editor's point of view that Trinity would also have been included. Of arguments for the doctrine there is indeed no lack; in Dr. Sanday's article on Jesus Christ there is a section on "The Paraclete and the Tri-unity of God," and again in his article on God (in N. T.) a section on "Distinctions in the Godhead" deals with "that which we call by anticipation the Doctrine of the Trinity in the N. T.," while in a concluding note on the literature of the subject Dr. Sanday, having remarked that "no considerable monograph in the Doctrine of God as Triune" has appeared since the elaborate works of Baur and Meier in the early forties of last century, adds: "A thorough discussion of the beginnings of the doctrine in English is still a desideratum. To look no further than his own articles in the present work, they prove how eminently fitted he is, from the standpoint of enlightened orthodox scholarship, to supply that want. Heretics, who take a radically different view of early Christian history, would be grateful to him for such a service, not less perhaps than those who would welcome him as a champion of the ecclesiastical dogma.

The character of this Dictionary and the high standard of its scholarship are by this time thoroughly well known, and many comparisons have naturally been made between it and the more radical Encyclopædia Biblica, of which the fourth and concluding volume has still to appear. Of the latter Professor Cheyne, the editor, has said in a recent article that it is "not merely a register of the opinions of the scholars of the past, nor of the average opinions of the scholars of to-day, but seeks also to present the opinions which are actually being formed, and, so far as possible within the necessary limitations, the methods and the evidence which seem to require them." It is undoubtedly rendering great services to Biblical scholarship, which are recognised even by those who regard some of "the opinions which are being formed" as verging upon the grotesque. Its many admirable qualities, and its fearless liberal spirit we can gratefully acknowledge, while at the same time we wish that some of its excursions in extreme radical criticism had been reserved for publication elsewhere, and the Encyclopædia had aimed rather at a consistent presentment of the generally accepted results of liberal criticism at the present time.

The Dictionary of the Bible, on the other hand, is unmistakably orthodox, and this is the great value of the work, that it furnishes us with ample materials for the study of the Bible, and at the same time a fair conspectus of enlightened orthodox opinion on the subject. That there is entire uniformity of belief among the contributors cannot, of course, be maintained, and we should prefer to think that very few accepted what appears to us the uncompromising Calvinism of the article on "Predestination," which to us, we confess, seems to involve a detestable moral juggle with the holiest conceptions of the righteousness and goodness of God.

Among the most valuable articles in this last volume is that on "Prophecy and Prophets," by the late Professor A. B. Davidson, filling more than twenty pages. After a sketch of the history of Hebrew Prophecy there follows a section on "the Prophetic Mind," from which we quote the following passage:—

> Prophecy was not an institution among other institutions, like priesthood and monarchy; it founded the monarchy and it claimed in the name of Jehovah to correct and instruct the priests as well as kings. Tholuck has defined the prophet as "the bearer of the idea of the theocracy." The definition is true in the sense that the prophets do not claim to be originators, they have inherited the principles which they teach; but it touches the prophet only on his intellectual side. The prophet was more than a teacher, and the theocracy was life as well as truth. The prophet was not only the bearer, he was the embodiment of the idea of the theocracy. The idea, which is that of the communion of the living God with mankind, was realised in him and through him in Israel. Though he could be distinguished from Israel he was, in truth, Israel at its highest. The prophets were not persons who stood as mere objective Divine instruments to the people whom they addressed; they were of the people; the life of the people flowing through the general mass only reached its flood-tide in them. Every feeling of the people, every movement of life in it, sent its impulse up to them; every hope and fear was reflected in their hearts. And it was with hearts so filled and minds so quickened and broad that they entered into the communion of God.

Another valuable article is that on "The Book of Psalms," by Professor W. T. Davison, with which should be read Professor Karl Budde's on "Hebrew Poetry." Professor Davison's section on the religious and ethical ideas of the Psalms is of special interest. As to authorship he takes a moderate critical view, admitting that it cannot be certainly proved that David wrote any Psalms at all, though the probability is that he wrote many, and that from ten to twenty of the Psalms in the existing book may have come down from him. Professor Cheyne, on the other hand, is quite convinced that David wrote none of our Psalms. Professor Driver is not so sure.

There is a general article on Versions of the Bible in this volume, while separate articles on such Versions as the Arabic, Armenian, Egyptian, Ethiopic, Syrian, the Septuagint and the Vulgate are scattered through the dictionary. After the general article comes one of great interest on "English Versions," by the Rev. George Milligan, B.D., who traces the story down from Wiclif, Purvey and Tindale, down to our present Revised Version. In spite of the disappearance of the "Three Heavenly Witnesses" he rests in the comfortable assurance that the alterations made have "in no particular seriously affected any of the doctrines of our faith, though in not a few instances these doctrines are now presented in a fuller and more convincing light."

The last article to which we must refer is that on "Writing," by Dr. F. G. Kenyon, of the British Museum, which is not only of great interest in itself, telling of the materials and methods of writing and of ancient libraries, but has some admirable illustrations of a cuneiform tablet (of the fourteenth century B.C.) and some old Hebrew and Greek manuscripts.

In bringing out this concluding volume of his Dictionary Dr. Hastings dedicates it to the memory of Sir Thomas Clarke, Baronet, for many years head of the firm so honourably associated with this and many other works of the highest value to religious scholarship, and of Professor A. B. Davidson, who was one of those distinguished scholars to whom the Dictionary and its Editor owed most of all.

SHORT NOTICES.

The Testament of Our Lord. Translated into English from the Syriac, with Introduction and Notes. By James Cooper, D.D., and Arthur John Maclean, M.A., F.R.G.S. The writing here translated has hitherto been very little known. Composed originally in Greek, it survives only in Syriac, Ethiopic, and Arabic translations, and though extracts from the Syriac and attempted reconstructions of the Greek were printed by Lagarde nearly half-a-century ago the full work was not made public till 1899, when the Syriac text with a Latin rendering was issued at Mainz by Mgr. Rahmani, Patriarch of Antioch. The present translation has been made directly from the Syriac, chiefly by Canon Maclean, but with the co-operation of Professor Cooper, of Glasgow University. The Testament itself professes to be a deliverance by Jesus to his disciples after the resurrection, and contains a series of regulations concerning church buildings, offices, institutions, and ritual. The ascription of these regulations to Jesus is, of course, only a literary device; the writing, in fact, belongs to the same type as the "Apostolic Constitutions," and its value is chiefly to the student of early Church doctrine and liturgics. The editors think that the theology of the book points to a date later than the rise of Arianism, yet earlier than the rise of Macedonianism; they are accordingly willing to accept Zahn's date (350 A.D.), but offer as an alternative the years 361-3, the reign of Julian the Apostate, whose edict of 362 forbidding the Christians to teach may have led the compiler to anticipate a repetition of the cruelties of Galerius, and so have caused the references to persecution which stand in the prologue. The present edition of the Testament is in every way admirable. The introduction is particularly full, clear, and impartial, and the critical notes are rich in illustrative material. The volume is uniform in appearance with the same publishers' Ante-Nicene Library. (Edinburgh: T. and T. Clark. 9s.)

The Gospel Manuscripts: a Short Account of the Results of Modern Research, by J. P. Holah. In addition to its account of the MSS. this little book contains chapters on the Synoptic Gospels, the Synoptic Problem, the Fourth Gospel, and the Canonisation process. Mr. Holah's investigations on these points lead him to the conclusion that the Bible is not infallible, but he argues that it is a gain to religion to recognise that the revelation of God is not confined to a special book. Mr. Holah's sympathies are on the radical side of New Testament criticism, and he seems to us in several matters superfluously sceptical, in the manner of "Supernatural Religion"; which volume is here given in a list of recommended books, along with several others that ought not to be recommended to the inexpert reader without considerable reserve. Mr. Holah is least trustworthy in relation to the MSS., where, apart from errors of fact, he exaggerates the amount of textual corruption, and does not give any counterbalancing explanation of the processes of textual criticism, which in the New Testament produce such reliable results. (R. Brimley Johnson. 1s. net.)

"For Better? For Worse?" Mr. G. W. E. Russell asked in a series of papers contributed to the Tatler and now gathered up into a pleasant volume printed in luxurious type. These "notes on social changes" find much to lament in the loss of the old simplicity of life, the growing luxury, the "emulous ostentation" of society. There has also been an increase, Mr. Russell thinks, in superstition, yet he does not despair of English religion, for at the same time in the higher ranks of society there is more frank sincerity of faith without any affectation of piety than there was a generation ago. Among these notes some good stories will be found. (Fisher Unwin. 3s. 6d.)

The Art of Success, Mr. T. Sharper Knowlson has written (some of it originally in Great Thoughts) as a supplement to his "Art of Thinking," which has been a success. He has plenty of sound common-sense advice to give, not overlooking questions of clothes and manners. "Get up early, retire early, and stick to business" is the recipe of one millionaire, which he quotes; and in a chapter on "Some Men who have Succeeded" the advice of such men as Sir George Newnes, Sir T. J. Lipton, Mr. J. S. Fry and the late Sir Philip Manfield, is recounted, from the Young Man. (F. Warne and Co. 2s. 6d.)

Flower-o'-the-Corn is one of the most vigorous of Mr. S. R. Crockett's popular stories, full of adventure and romance from the old days of the revolt of the Camisards of the Cevennes against Louis XIV. The hero is a young Captain under Marlborough's command. (James Clarke and Co. 6s.)

The Poetry of Plants, by Dr. Hugh Macmillan, is not, the preface tells us, a botanical treatise, but simply a collection of popular studies, "showing the many points of beauty and interest about some of the commonest of our trees and wild flowers." The primrose and the daffodil, the foxglove and the bluebell are among their number. There is a paper on "The Cyclamen of the Holy Land," another on "The Glaze on the Flower of the Buttercup." Poetic feeling and religion blend with scientific knowledge to mark the character of these papers, some of which are reprinted from Good Words. (Isbister and Co. 6s.)

Copies of the Rev. E. P. Barrow's little book of Fire side Fables, published by Elliot Stock, 1s. 6d. net, about which we wrote in the "Children's Column" on March 8, can now be had from the Sunday School Association (Essex Hall).

Miss F. E. Cooke's Story of Dr. Channing was published originally in 1884, and with her Story of Theodore Parker has long been among the most treasured of our short biographies for young people. A second edition, in the same form as Miss Cooke's Dorothea Dix, Whittier, and Francis of Assisi, and with a reproduction of the well-known portrait of Channing as frontispiece, has now been issued and will not lack of many grateful readers (Sunday School Association, Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, W.C. 1s. net.)

We are very glad to welcome an English reprint, revised by the Editor, of the Unity Tract on Ralph Waldo Emerson: Passages from his Writings with a brief sketch of his life and a Reading-Guide, by William C. Gannett. This admirable pamphlet has already been used by Reading Circles, in class and for Postal Mission purposes. This new edition should secure for it a still more widely-extended usefulness. (B. and F.U.A., Essex Hall. 3d.)

By a slip of the pen in the notice of "Glimpses of Tennyson" last week, the book was attributed to Miss Maud Weld; it should have read Miss Agnes Grace Weld, as correctly given in the footnote.

On the five Sundays of November the Springfield Republican, one of the best and most influential of American daily papers, published a valuable series of articles by Dr. J. H. Crooker of Ann Arbour on "The Historical Jesus." The articles were specially written for the Republican, and are the fruit of long experience and effort in trying to interest University students in the life and teaching of Jesus. It is matter for sincere congratulation that these articles should have gained the wide publicity ensured to them by publication in such a journal. "The Place of Jesus in History," "What Gospel Criticism Finds," "A New Appreciation of Jesus," "Our Master of the Inner Life," "Whence the Authority of Jesus"—these sub-titles of the five articles indicate the trend of their argument, which is worked out with great clearness and persuasive power.

The true humanity of Jesus is Dr. Crooker's constant theme, and the self-evidencing power of the great spiritual truths which he declared in his teaching and in his life. There have been other great personalities in history and other commanding religious teachers, but none quite as he, with such marvellous blending of spiritual authority and attractive power.

Jesus has stood for a tender intimacy of fellowship which no other prophet has ever inspired. There is loyalty to Mohammed, respect for Confucius, imitation of Buddha, but love for Jesus—men have taken him into their hearts. Jesus above all else has been a personal presence building himself into the lives of men. People have kept the wonderful Man who walked through the fields of Galilee in their most intimate and loving fellowship. Nothing like this, to the same extent or with equal spiritual power, has been true of any other character in history.

Criticism has, indeed, stripped away much that was formerly thought to belong to Jesus, but not so as to dissipate the essential truth of his life. He himself is brought nearer to us, and his actual teaching gains a fresh reality and power. We understand the Gospels now as we never did before.

We find in the great sayings which they contain, not fetters for the mind, but fuel for the altar, fires of the heart; not chains to bind opinion, but wings to lift the soul; not material out of which to construct dogmas, but prophecies of the heart that enrich the life. We study the parables for inspiration rather than authority. We read the Gospels, not to prove miracles and discredit science, but to warm our hearts to heroism, mercy, and self-sacrifice, and so to equip ourselves with the motive power of a nobler life. We find in these documents, not the report of a mystical transaction that enables us to settle with a Shylock in the skies, but something infinitely better; the dynamic record of a sublime life that purifies us and makes us friends of God, the Father.

The Gospels, when allowed to shine in their own light, which is the light of love, lend themselves to a new and higher ministry. We ought to handle them rationally, but reverently, for increase of inner life. These pages fire our hearts with ennobling motives, the less we go to them for dogma and the more we use them for communion with one who went about doing good, and who, in so doing, showed us the true way of life.

Dr. Crooker, having briefly described the results of modern criticism of the Gospels, pleads very earnestly that parents, teachers, and preachers should not ignore the new light of history, but frankly let their actual convictions of truth be known.

Nothing will drive young people into religious indifference quicker than the suspicion that they are being trifled with; that ministers are hedging. This suspicion is even now at work. There is no safety except in facing the situation. No possible change in our conception of Jesus can work such havoc to piety as disloyalty to truth and resort to duplicity.

As to the actual results of Gospel criticism, it is no doubt true that there is now greater uncertainty as to specific incidents in the life of Jesus, "but the essential quality of his character shines in clearer light and exerts upon us a more helpful influence."

The Gospels do become, in the hands of modern scholars, in spite of all apparent losses, both more interesting and more instructive. The figure of Jesus becomes less mystical, but more real. We may not be so sure as our fathers were of some details, but we are more certain of the large and heroic outline. These Gospels, that have become new because seen in a new light, really help us to a fuller understanding and a warmer admiration of Jesus. We are using them to-day more in harmony with the purpose for which they were written—namely, to communicate his spirit and report his message. They did not create Christianity. They were created by the Church to perpetuate the image and embody the story of its founder.

A TRANSVAAL BURGHER CAMP.

THE Rev. C. J. Street, of Bolton, sends us the following extracts from a letter which he has received from Nurse Bertha Sutcliffe, who has been one of the sisters at the Krugersdorp Burgher Camp. Our readers will remember an earlier letter from the same source. This letter is sent from the Burgher Camp, Potchefstroom, Western Transvaal, where Miss Sutcliffe is "now assistant matron."

"Nov. 2. This is reckoned one of the prettiest parts of the Transvaal. It is certainly very pretty, so green and well watered. It is on the Mooi River. But no place will ever be to me what Krugersdorp was, and really the camp here is not nearly so pretty. This is a large piece of table-land, whereas Krugersdorp was on the side of a huge kopje, which sheltered it from the severe winds, and yet in front of us we had lovely views.

"This is the largest camp in the Transvaal, and, when full, there were between 7,000 and 8,000 people here; now we have only a little over 3,000. Most of the people who had farms have gone home. Every week great numbers of them are returning from St. Helena, Bermuda, India, &c.; but there are still a great many to come, and there are some who will not take the oath. I feel sorry for the wives of these men when they see the other women's husbands coming home. Many of the camps are already closed, and others, including Krugersdorp, will close at the end of this month. This will be kept on until Feb. 1, 1903; it is possible that it may be kept on even longer under the 'Repatriation Board,' but the 'Burgher Camps Department' ceases to exist then; so that I shall not be home before April at any rate.

"The health is fairly good now. A year ago the death-rate was very high indeed, as many as thirty-nine a day frequently. They were much worse off here than Krugersdorp, as the transports were more difficult. It is only about sixty miles from Johannesburg, but it is, even now in times of peace, a six hours' journey by rail. Since being here I have been out for several long drives over the veldt. It is very sad to see the wrecked farmhouses, scarcely even the four walls standing, and in some cases even the fruit trees cut down. They say that they had to use the fruit trees to cook their food.

"It is now almost midsummer, and very hot in the middle of the day, but still rather cold at night. The peach trees are now loaded with fruit, which will be ripe at Christmas, and will be dropping into the streets, as they overhang every hedge. The pomegranates are in full bloom now with a lovely scarlet flower. The rainy season is just commencing, and sometimes it simply pours with rain for the greater part of the day; but there are very few days that the sun does not shine gloriously for some part of the day. I think the most uncomfortable weather which we have to encounter here is the sand-storms; they are almost beyond description. All will be quiet, when suddenly, if you look across the valley, you will see thick clouds of sand, and just have time to rush in and 'maak to die tent,' when it is upon you. In a very bad storm it is quite dark, and the tents are shaking as though they must come down—sometimes they do. It may last ten minutes or an hour; and when it has passed, everything, including ourselves, is thick with khaki-coloured sand.

"A month ago we had a little outbreak of measles again; but we shall not get a severe epidemic this year, partly because strict measures have been taken to check it, and also that so many are immune, as few escaped last year. When the first case occurred this year we took a census of the children under twelve years; and out of 930 children 53 had not had measles."

Among many incidents and observations of a three days' picnic, driving over the veldt and visiting the famous caves familiar to the readers of Rudyard Kipling, Miss Sutcliffe refers to the following:—

"We drove to Turf-fontein, which was one of De Wet's greatest strongholds, where we arrived at 6 P.M. Two of the gentlemen rode across the river, the Wonderfontein, to the farm, to ask the farmer's permission to pitch our tents. He was very pleased to grant it; and not only that, but he sent over a bucket of milk—four gallons—which was a great luxury, as we never see any fresh milk. I have had nothing but tinned milk for eleven months.

"Everyone was most kind to us, shaking hands in the friendliest manner with the officers whom they were fighting against only a few months ago. When we first got to this farm the Cape-cart stopped about a hundred yards away from the house, or rather where the house was, and the three 'khakis' rode up. The mother and children came out; then the men came and spoke to them. As I watched them from a distance, I could just imagine that it was six months ago, and that the men would be taken prisoners, whilst the women and children were put on to the waggon and taken to the nearest camp, and that if they looked back as they rode away, they would see their homestead in flames. But those times are over, we are happy to say. We met one Boer farmer on the way who stopped to speak to us, and had a little refreshment with us. He told us that, although he had fought from the beginning of the war to the last day, 'Nooit in myn leven het ik gezeyd verdamde Engelsman, en ik hoop geen Engelsman ooit zal zeggen verdamde Boer.'

"We had driven about eighty-five miles in the three days. In all that distance not one house was standing. Most of the people had returned, but were living in bell-tents or sheds just roughly covered with corrugated zinc.

"I enclose a penholder which is only one of many scores of little offerings from my people. It was made in St. Helena by a prisoner of war. They have made some beautiful things with no tools but just a pocket-knife."

OBITUARY.

MRS. E. B. SQUIRE.

MRS. EDMUND BURNARD SQUIRE, who died at Hampstead on the 12th inst., in the seventy-second year of her age, was the third daughter of the late Henry Bradshaw Fearon.

The spirit of the home in which she was brought up was one of thoughtfulness for others, and of the desire not merely to help, but, as an old friend writes, to find out where help was needed; and this remained a guiding principle throughout her life.

One of her earliest interests was a class for girls, originally started by Miss Emma Kinder, which she and her sisters afterwards continued in their Frognal home. When the Rosslyn Hill congregation migrated to the new chapel—towards the building of which she was one of the most generous helpers—the old chapel was set free for school purposes, after which this class was carried on there.

She was a member of the Rosslyn Hill congregation when the Rev. Dr. Sadler entered on his ministry in the year 1846, and her close friendship with Dr. and Mrs. Sadler was one of the deepest and happiest influences of her life; while into all their work at Rosslyn Hill she and Mr. Squire entered with unfailing and active interest.

She was a warm supporter of the London Domestic Mission, especially of the Spicer-street branch, through the many years of Mr. Corkran's work there, and later she made every effort to continue his work and influence through the Mansford-street Church and Mission, which was founded in 1889 with the Rev. Henry Gow as its first minister.

It was in connection with these Missions that the little Sanatorium at Hampstead was founded in memory of an elder sister who died young, and for forty years she was its sole manager, taking the keenest personal interest in every inmate, giving ever-ready help to all, and cheering them by her frequent visits, continued to the very last, often when she was physically unfit for the exertion.

The main characteristic of all her work was its conscientious thoroughness down to the smallest detail, her aim being always to find out the best and wisest way of helping; and her interest in anything which she undertook was unflagging through all discouragement or difficulty.

Only the inner circle of most intimate friends can fully appreciate the personal charm of a character so sympathetic and so true, but a very large number in all classes will remember her as the unfailing friend whose presence cheered in sickness and suffering, and whose sympathy was with them in both their sorrows and their joys.

Although many symptoms of failing health were present, the end came with little warning, and she passed on into the larger life.

The funeral took place at the new Hampstead Crematorium on Thursday morning, Dec. 18, after a private service at the house. Both services were conducted by the Rev. E. Daplyn. A memorial service was held on Sunday morning at Rosslyn Hill Chapel, conducted by the Rev. H. Gow.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

What he Brought us.

WHAT did he bring in his pockets? That was the question I put to Blue-eyes and Brown-eyes. "He" was their uncle—at least we called him so—Uncle Annus, son of Grandfather Tempus; and he had paid a good many visits to me, not nearly so many to Blue-eyes, and very few indeed to little Brown-eyes. But whenever he came he brought lots of good things in his pockets for all of us. Such big, wonderful pockets—no wonder we made a fuss when he came and went.

Pockets! He had more than little Brownie could well count, even using all her fingers and two thumbs as well. At first Master Blue-eyes, too, found it hard to reckon them all up, till I pointed out that Uncle Annus always comes with two coats, one rough and darkish for the outside, and one softer and lighter for the inside; and by good luck he has three pockets on each side of each coat. There are three on the right side of the top-coat, three on the left, three on the right side of the under-coat, and just three again on the left—and there you are. Four threes are—"twelve," said Blue-eyes promptly, and without winking. He is getting on well with his tables.

Right; twelve of them—twelve pockets filled with all sorts of good things for all of us. I tell you, he is just the uncle for me. I have seen his hand go searching down into that deep pocket at the bottom on the right-hand side—but please draw a picture of him, I said, before I go on. Make his face as jolly and wise as you like, and be sure to draw him in his big top-coat, which must be thrown well open to show the under-coat. Now put a mark in the proper place for every one of those three pockets on each side of each coat. And now we can go on.

I have seen his hand go diving into that deep pocket at the bottom on the right-hand side of the top-coat (mark it for me), and bring out ever so many things. But you shall tell me some of them. Remember, that bottom pocket is called January—now, what comes out of it?

"Snow," said Blue-eyes, at once. "Robins," shouted Brownie, clapping her hands as she saw what the game was. Anything else? "Snowdrops," said she. Very well—Snow, Snow-drops and Robins; a good beginning. Now feel up the rough coat to the next pocket above. That is it, Feb—with an r after the b please, F-e-b-r-u-a-r-y. What shall we find there?

"Rain," cried the boy. Rather awkward to carry that in your pocket, eh? But what a bad job it would be if Uncle Annus didn't carry some for us in every pocket! Rain; go on. "Crocuses," "Willow-wrens," "Hazel-catkins"—the answers came quickly. "Almond-blossoms," Blue-eyes ventured. He is a fairly clever boy, but apt to be in a hurry. No, hardly the pink and white almond-blossom in February, unless we are very lucky; but see, a great spray of it is peeping out of the March pocket—the top one on the right, you know. And what else comes out of that?

"Wind," said Blue-eyes; "Daffodils," said my curly pet. "Wall-flowers," "Sloe-blossom," "Buds"—yes, they come out bursting at the tips. What else? "Thrushes"—right; but they really began singing in November. "Skylarks,"—well, perhaps; certainly, if Uncle Annus does not bring too much snow and hail for a last pelt at us out of his winter coat. But see, it must be getting warmer, for he flings the top-coat wide open, and his right hand goes down to the bottom of the inside coat.

You know what that pocket's name is—"April." Well, what does he bring in it? "Swallows," "Cuckoo," "Cherry-blossom," "Primroses," "Green Leaves," "Pear-blossom," "Little white Lambs," said Brownie; "Showers," said the boy. What, and no sunshine? Oh, lots of it! What a garden he makes of England when he empties the April pocket over it! And then the next—"May":—"Oh, I know," burst in both at once, "Daisies," "Buttercups," "Green fields," "Cowslips," "Blue-bells," "Apple-blossom," "Linnets," "Blackbirds"—yes, a full chorus of warblers, including the nightingale, sweetest of them all. "Blue skies"—I should think so!

What about the next month? Why here it is, at the very top on the right of the inside coat, and its name is June. "Roses," shouted Brownie; and Blue-eyes was just going to, and was a bit vexed that she got it out first. "Lilies," he said, and added to make up, "and Mignonette, and Sweet-peas, and Sweet-williams." Yes, all sorts of "sweets." "Curly Ferns," said the little girl—good. "Gooseberries," cried one; "Cherries," the other; both cried "Currants." "Peas"—we were evidently in for a fruit-shop catalogue. Anything else? "Baby-birds"—yes, chicks of all kinds; and children at play are as nice as any when they are sweet and good.

But we must cross over to the left side; what about July, this top-pocket of the inner coat. "Hot days"—and nights, said I. "Shady woods," said the boy. Right! "Heather," "Hare-bells," "Gorse," he fired off in a volley, with a keen remembrance of a holiday in Wales. "Hay," said tiny tot, whose travels have not yet been very far. "Strawberries," "Wood-pigeons," "Butterflies." Oh, they have been fluttering out of the last two or three pockets, you know. "Bees," said Blue eyes. Yes, bees among the clover, good. "Wasps!" added Brown-eyes, solemnly. I hastened on.

Here is August, then—second pocket down on the left. What is here? "Corn-fields"; well, sheaves of corn in the south, certainly. "Poppies," yes; "Raspberries," "Holidays," very good! "Water Wagtails," "Bullfinches," "Yellow-ammers"—another long list, birds this time, seen and heard on rambles. And September?—the bottom pocket on the inside coat, left side—"Apples," "Pears," "Plums," "Blackberries," "Nuts," "Grapes," "Acorns," "Rose-apples," "Horse-chestnuts"—ah, a great harvest of rich things—all to be gathered in with harvest singing.

But isn't the air getting cooler? Uncle Annus is pulling his top-coat round him again, and here on the rough outside again (at the top) we come to the October pocket. Has he anything here? "Brown leaves"—yes, beginning to fall; brown, russet, red, scarlet, golden, all sorts of jolly colours, in the woods and on the walls covered with creeper. "Rabbits," "Pheasants," "Hawthorn berries"—and "Sunsets," said little Brownie, who (I think) was getting a wee bit tired, bu played up bravely. Yes, I agreed; splendid sunny days and evenings in this pocket, and often in the next. "What, in November?" shouted the boy in derision; "the month of fogs!" Well, yes; even in November at times. And don't you remember the mad scampering leaves when the gales swept them up the road? and don't you remember the flowers? "Flowers?" they both queried. Certainly. What about the starry ivy-blossom? They remembered, and the boy, from fresh experience, added, "Silvery Hoar-frost"; and Brownie said, "Blue-tits."

So we came at last to December, at the bottom on the left of the rough great-coat of the Old Year—for who else could Uncle Annus be? And when we reached this pocket we all got quite excited, and the answers came came sharp and fast—"Ice," "Slides," "Holly," "Misletoe," "Oranges," "Christmas," "Cards," "Carols," "Parties"—I really had to put a stop to their answers, and get down as many as I could on a long, very long slip of paper. And then, when we had got a list made of all we could remember that came out of these twelve wonderful "pockets," we were surprised to find how many of our dearest treasures and delights had been left out after all.

"Why, where's Mother?" I asked. "Oh, she—she's in every one of the pockets," said Blue-eyes; and Brown-eyes said so too, with great emphasis. And, like "Mother," we found that very, very many other good gifts of the year were really given, not in one month only, but all the time—food, clothing, shelter, books, teachers, friends, health, games, pets, homes—"Why, just everything!" cried Brownie. Well, the best things we do seem to have always, don't we? Though, sometimes, a certain boy and girl I know (said I, looking very serious indeed) grumble and growl because they can't have this little thing or that, and forget all the good things they can have and do have every day.

There was silence, and a little, very little choke somewhere in two little throats, and something like it in a bigger throat; and then we all brightened up at once, and sang with all our hearts—

Praise to God, and thanksgiving!
Hearts bow down, and voices sing
Praises to the Glorious One
All his year of wonders done.

W. G. TARRANT.

THERE is nothing more true in connection with human life than that we grow into the likeness of those things we contemplate. Literally and scientifically, and necessarily true is it that "as a man thinketh in his heart, so is he." The "is" part is his character. His character is the sum total of his habits. His habits have been formed by his conscious acts; but every conscious act is preceded by a thought.—R. W. Trine.

HOPE much of yourself, and you will achieve much. In your life remember your prayers, and in the heat of the world think on the dreams of your youth. Who knows what good shall be done by your fidelity? This you know, that it is all God demands of you. Try this, not fearing man but loving God, and in you heart shall the trumpet speak with no uncertain sound, cheering you on.—Theodore Parker.

LONDON, DECEMBER 27, 1902.

A YEAR AND SIXTY YEARS.

AT the end of a year, in the season of Christmas home-gatherings and of many tender and sacred memories of the past, one is apt to speak very openly to friends and with great simplicity of the issues of life and death, of the aspirations and purposes with which one looks forward to the coming time.

THE INQUIRER also has a life of its own, a life which depends largely for its continuance on loyal friendship and unselfish service of great ends. The past year, as our readers will remember, has had its trials so far as the future and the well-being of this journal were concerned. There was a crisis in which, to speak in parable, the editor's life hung upon a thread. Indeed, his epitaph was already written, very kindly, but quite decisively. Then came reprieve. Strong hands were held out, restoratives, and a general, most generous, amnesty. To him was again committed the difficult duty of carrying on this work, with ampler means and fuller co-operation. The fresh opportunity was given, which must be the strongest incentive to more strenuous endeavour. For himself, in this service five years are now completed, and what the coming years may bring he cannot tell. He does not ask to know, but looking back upon those years he must be allowed one word of heartfelt thankfulness, which cannot really be expressed, for the constant kindness and forbearance of many friends, near and distant, and chiefly of those who, throughout those years, have been most closely associated with the responsibilities of the work.

In July came the happy celebration of THE INQUIRER'S sixty years. It was with the utmost pleasure and encouragement that we received greetings and good wishes from some friends who had been directly interested in the establishment of our paper, and had taken part in its early efforts, and from others of successive generation, all uniting in goodwill, and in hopes for a prosperous future. And it was with special gratification that we received so many greetings from abroad, from those who are devoted to the same service of liberal religious thought and life. It is a constant source of happiness to be assured that THE INQUIRER is a welcome visitor to those distant friends, and has had words of encouragement and help for them, as they undoubtedly strengthen our faith and courage, and give to us the inspiration which comes with the sense of a world-wide sympathy in devotion to a common cause. In the New Year we look forward to another meeting of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers, to be held in September at Amsterdam, and this hope of meeting again so many true friends will be one of the brightest anticipations in our immediate future.

The past months have brought to THE INQUIRER much generous help. Far from content with any past achievement, we look forward with earnest purpose and good hope to the New Year. Trusting in the generous sympathy of our churches and of many friends beyond their borders, we shall continue the endeavour to serve their highest interests, as servants of truth and the broadest religious fellowship, standing for Christian brotherhood and the freedom of a spiritual faith, and that beneficence which works ever for the Kingdom of GOD on earth.

RETROSPECT OF THE YEAR 1902.

PEACE must be our first thought, most thankfully recalled, as we look back upon the past year: the end of the war, which for two and a half years brought desolation to South Africa, and on this country laid many heavy burdens. In the glory of the spring-time the message came at last, that Peace was made. Since then the Boer leaders have been in this country and Mr. Chamberlain has gone to South Africa, they and all true patriots being bent on doing whatever is possible to restore prosperity to the countries now incorporated in the British Empire, to bring relief to the multitude of sufferers, to build up again the desolated homes, and to lay new foundations of unity and friendship for those who are now to live together as one people.

After the Peace came preparations for the Coronation, suddenly brought to an end by the King's illness, and the days of acute anxiety, while after a severe operation, his life hung in the balance. Then the weeks of convalescence, and in August the Coronation at last happily accomplished, with less magnificence in the exterior accompaniments than had been at first intended, but with far deeper and truer feeling, after what had taken place, in the relation which subsisted between King and people.

The Conference of Colonial Premiers was one of the events of the year of more significance for the future well-being of the Empire than many more conspicuous occurrences.

As to the Government of this country, the retirement of Lord Salisbury (followed by that of Sir M. Hicks-Beach) brought a change which could not in the course of nature be long delayed, and secured to Mr. Balfour the succession as Prime Minister. His great achievement has been to insist, with his overwhelming Parliamentary majority, and in spite of the strongest opposition throughout the country and the omens of most significant bye-elections, on the passing of a revolutionary Education Bill. The School-board system, which has done magnificent work for education in the great centres of population during the past thirty years, is abolished, the schools of a privileged Church are re-endowed at the public expense, and incorporated in what aims at being a uniform system of national education; but to the people, who are to pay for the support of the schools, the right of adequate control, which is their due, has been refused. How the new system will work in practice, under the authority of the County and Borough Councils, remains in great uncertainty. What is certain is that the people of this country will not long suffer denominational interests to dominate where national education must be the first concern, and where popular control is their undoubted right.

Ecclesiastical Affairs.

The Church has had great opportunities during the year, in impressive national services, of thanksgiving for peace, of intercession and thanksgiving for the King's recovery, and at the Coronation. Her stately ritual and the power of solemn music have been used to full effect, and the power of prophetic speech has not been entirely lacking. Early in the year Canon Gore was consecrated Bishop of Worcester, the appointment having been made in 1901. After the Coronation, Dr. Bradley resigned the Deanery of Westminster and was succeeded by Canon Armitage Robinson. The Dean of Ripon caused much excitement in orthodox circles by an address in October to the Churchmen's Union for the advancement of Liberal Religious Thought on "Natural Christianity," which he has so far declined to publish; a more satisfactory instance of liberalism in the Church was that of Canon Cremer, Vicar of Eccles, who before Easter arranged for a series of Sunday evening addresses in his church, after the ordinary evening service, on "The Church of England and her Daughters," in which representatives of different denominations were invited to show what had been "the special contribution of each section of the Christian Church to the common life of the whole." The address in this series on "The Unitarian Movement" was to have been given by the Rev. Alexander Gordon, Principal of the Home Missionary College, but the Bishop of Manchester intervened, and the address was ultimately given by Canon Cremer himself, and afterwards published in full on March 8 in these columns.

The Jowett Lectures at the Passmore Edwards Settlement, Tavistock-place, were this year given by the Rev. W. Addis, M.A., of Manchester College, Oxford, on "The Hebrew Scriptures in the New Testament and in the Christian Church."

For the great bodies of Evangelical Nonconformity the year has been notable through the completion of their Twentieth Century Funds. The Wesleyans have secured their million guineas, and have taken a bold step in the purchase of the Aquarium site for the erection of a great central hall and offices in the immediate neighbourhood of Westminster Abbey. The Baptists also completely realised their aim in raising a Fund of a quarter of a million. The Congregationalists in a sense more than raised their half-million, the Fund reaching over £710,000. But the greater part of this was reserved by the churches for their own purposes, for the extinction of debts, &c., and the contributions to the Central Fund did not reach £100,000.

Two prominent inquisitions of heresy have taken place during the year. In May the General Assembly of the United Free Church of Scotland refused, by a large majority, to entertain a charge against Professor George Adam Smith, on account of alleged unsound teaching in his "Modern Criticism and the Preaching of the Old Testament." Later in the year the Wesleyan Conference also refused by a large majority to allow Dr. Agar Beet to be deprived of his professorship at the Richmond College, on account of heretical teaching on the subject of the fate of the wicked and the doctrine of the Last Things. Dr. Beet, however, consented to be silenced in his college teaching by the authority of the Conference so far as his special views were concerned.

The celebration of the Oliver Heywood Bicentenary, especially in Yorkshire, was an occasion of equal interest to orthodox and unorthodox Nonconformiy.

Our Free Churches.

For our own churches the year opened with the happy announcement that the capital sum of £20,000 required for the establishment of a Superannuation Fund for ministers had been secured, and before long the society was formally established as the Ministers' Pension and Insurance Fund, with the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter as first President, and Mr. J. Cogan Conway as Secretary.

For the rest there have been few striking events, but a steady continuance in earnest work. The National Conference Guilds' Union has been actively engaged in encouraging the work of Young Peoples' Guilds in our churches; a successful summer session for Sunday-school teachers was again held at Manchester College, Oxford, in July, and later in the summer the Unitarian Workers' Union had a holiday meeting at Aberyswith, and paid some most interesting visits to the Unitarian churches of South Wales. Since October the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke has been the regular morning preacher at Little Portland-street Chapel, in pursuance of a six months' engagement. During the autumn the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter delivered his course of lectures on "The Bible in the Nineteenth Century" to large audiences at Bristol, Swansea, Manchester and Leicester. The centenary of the South Wales Unitarian Association was celebrated, and also that of the Moretonhampstead Chapel. A notable feature of the Whitsuntide meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association was the reading of five papers on "Types of Religious Experience," by men who had left five different religious communities and had become Unitarians. These papers are shortly to appear as a volume. Dr. Drummond's Essex Hall Lecture on "Some Thoughts on Christology" was also of the highest value.

During the year services have been begun at Acton; an iron church has been opened at Widnes by the Liverpool District Missionary Association; "All Souls' Church" at Wolverhampton, and a new Church Hall at Reading have also been opened. On leaving Padiham, the Rev. J. H. Wicksteed gave his house to the congregation for a parsonage. Early in the year the memorial windows to Matthew Henry and James Martineau, placed in Matthew Henry's Chapel at Chester by Sir John Brunner, in connection with the Bicentenary of the chapel, were unveiled, and the Church Hall and Cloisters given to the Ullet-road Church, Liverpool, by Sir John Brunner and the late Mr. Henry Tate, as a memorial of their fathers, were opened.

The number of ministerial changes have been considerable. Among them may be mentioned the settlement of the Rev. R. H. Greaves at Highgate, the Rev. G. Critchley at Kentish Town, and the Rev. Robert McGee at Colne, new-comers who have been heartily welcomed into our fellowship. The Rev. Henry Gow has entered on his ministry at Hampstead, the Rev. John Ellis at Mansford-street, the Rev. W. G. Cadman at Macclesfield, the Rev. A. H. Dolphin at Upperthorpe, Sheffield, the Rev. F. H. Vaughan at Hull, the Rev. A. H. Thomas at Stourbridge. The Rev. C. D. Badland has removed from Yarmouth to Whitchurch, the Rev. Thomas Robinson is succeeded by the Rev. A. L Smith at Hale. The Rev. J. H. Wicksteed has been appointed District Minister by the London District Unitarian Society. These are only a part of the changes of the year, and others are impending.

Events of great personal interest to a wide circle of friends were the presentation of the portrait of Alderman Harry Rawson, of Manchester, to the Trustees of the Memorial Hall, and the celebration of the eightieth birthday of Dr. Edward Everett Hale, in America, and of Miss Frances Power Cobbe in this country.

Books.

Of books published during the year, the "Life of Dr. Martineau," by Dr. Drummond and Professor Upton, holds the first place. And there have been others of peculiar interest in their bearing upon liberal religious thought and life, such as Professor William James's Gifford Lectures on "Varieties of Religious Experience," and the volume of essays, "Contentio Veritatis," by six Oxford tutors. The great success of the first number of the Hibbert Journal, published in October, has been matter for warm congratulation and high hope for the future. The Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter's elaborate work on "The Composition of the Hexateuch" (of which we hope very shortly to publish a review) is a second edition of the Introduction and other parts of the greater work on the Hexateuch published two years ago, and which ranks among the chief recent achievements in Biblical Scholarship. From our brethren in America we have received several welcome contributions to religious literature, including the Rev. J. T. Bixby's "The New World and the New Thought," the Rev. T. R. Slicer's "One World at a Time," and Dr. M. J. Savage's "Men and Women." Other books of the greatest value are on their way across the Atlantic.

Obituary.

To the list of those who have passed away during the year we must add, at the last moment, Dr. Temple, Archbishop of Canterbury. It is a very varied list, which includes some men of the first distinction in their several spheres: Professor Tiele, of Leiden; Professor A. B. Davidson, of Edinburgh; Professor Adamson, of Glasgow, and formerly of Owens College, Manchester; Professor Virchow, of Berlin; Lord Dufferin, Lord Acton, Lord Kimberley, Lord Pauncefote, M. Jean de Bloch, Cecil Rhodes, Herr Krupp, Dr. Angus, the Rev. Hugh Price Hughes, Dr. Joseph Parker, the Rev. Newman Hall, Dr. S. R. Gardiner, Sydney Cooper, Bret Harte, and Philip James Bailey. From our own immediate fellowship we have lost Mr. William Rathbone, Field-Marshal Sir Neville Chamberlain, Mr. Frank Taylor, Mr. I. M. Wade, and Mr. Henry Tate; Miss Mary Ellen Martineau, Miss Caroline A. Martineau, Miss Rowland, of Neath; Miss Lamport, of Lancaster; Lady Bowring, Miss R. Davenport Hill, Miss E. J. Garrett, Miss Estlin, and Mrs. Edmund Squire. The losses from the roll of our ministers are unusually large, including the Revs. Joseph Harrison, P. W. Clayden, G. Vance Smith, T. Carter, E. S. Anthony, T. W. Scott, D. L. Evans, F. Revitt, J. Knapton, and J. Panton Ham. These are but a few of those who have passed on, but who leave our life richer in sacred memories and inspiration for faithful service.

AS THY DAYS, THY STRENGTH.

"As thy day so shall thy strength be."
Ah! dear heart, 'twas ever true,
Since the first soul's need was tended—
True for me, and you.

Strength is lent us when we're sinking
'Neath life's crushing load of care;
When we're weak then are we strongest—
Strong through faith and prayer.

Rest securely in the promise,
Anchor there thy whole soul's trust;
Do not fear that He will fail thee,
Who is kind and just.

Search thy heart and say did ever
Dawning fail to end the night?
Say did ever doubt's dark windings
Fail to lead to light?

Leave thy griefs, thy dread forebodings
At His feet; then, 'spite of fear,
Thou shalt rest in calm assurance
Of a Helper near.

Precious truth! benignant promise!
Keep it ever in thy view.
Strength shall come when most 'tis needed—
Come to me, and you. F. L.

BRUSSELS.—The Rev. J. Hocart writes from 55, rue St. Bernard:—"May I make use of THE INQUIRER to acknowledge a donation of £1 from 'A Sympathiser,' who gives no address? In answer to our appeal we have received £11, and would be very grateful for some further help."

THE EVILS CAUSED BY DRINK.*

You and I can do something in respect of most things which want doing. We can do a good deal towards lessening the intolerable evils caused by drink. And first we have to realise how great they are, or try faintly to do so. For though we may use violent and exaggerated language, we shall find it almost impossible, quite impossible I think, to represent to ourselves half the evil which is being wrought by drink always and everywhere War, as we have lately learnt to our cost, is wasteful of life and resources: tears and ruin and misery mark the wide path it treads. Plague and pestilence respect no sanctities of home, but enter palace and cottage, and select their victims indiscriminately, regardless of rank and sex and worth. Famine wastes the land, and its inhabitants fall by thousands and pine to slow death or become dependent upon the charity of strangers. But more destructive than War, more reckless than Plague, more wasting than Famine is Drink. For war has its rules and is only occasional; there are no rules to check the outrages Drink is the cause of, nor is there ever a time when it ceases to work as an agent for maintaining hell on earth. Plague can be kept off by rigid regulations and continual watchfulness, and, because all men dread it, these are constantly maintained; but Drink has its fascinations and is little feared, its intrusion is never resented and it is allowed free course in our midst. Yet who would not rather die of cholera or plague than of the delirium which is the drunkard's end? Famine we can cope with now that means of communication are so many and quick, but these very means facilitate the spread of alcoholic poison at home and abroad, and civilisation brings to the savage temptation and vice before it has had time to teach him aught of the worth of life.

Let us look around us. The fear which besets us English folk to-day is that we shall lose our commercial supremacy. And what shall become of the teeming millions of this little island when the goods we manufacture are no more in request? It is Mr. Carnegie, that cute Anglo-American, that good and generous friend to his native land, who warns us of "the vast advantage which both Europe and America have over Britain in the sobriety and regular habits of their workmen. The broken days of Britain both handicapped the employer and injured the workman. There was such wide scope for improvement that the most despondent might be encouraged; nor did the reform imply want or suffering, or less desirable conditions of life for either employer or employed; far otherwise. The drink bill of this country, now reaching the incredible figure of 160 millions sterling, should be cut in half, or only a quarter or less of it left—better still, if only twenty millions were left. . . . . If the people of the United Kingdom could spend even £1 per head more per year, her home commerce would be increased more than the total value of all her exports to Australia and New Zealand, to Canada, and to China combined. True, foreign commerce is a braggart always in evidence, home commerce is the true thing." I don't know, I am no judge in these matters, but I have much faith in Mr. Carnegie as a prominently successful man of business. If £1 a head wisely spent would do much for us, what would not £4 a head do, which we might save from our drink bill and yet leave 16s. 11d. for every man, woman and child as the average expenditure on intoxicating liquors! Things have been going well for a long time now, but the time of trial is assuredly before us, and the longer it is delayed the more severe will it be—if we continue to waste our time, our money, our energies as we are doing now in Drink.

Or look across the Channel to that distressful country whose moaning and reproaches are ever in our ears. What is the matter with Ireland? Why does its population decline as rapidly as ours increases? Why is it always poor, always discontented, always on the verge of rebellion, always the avowed enemy of the country to which fate has irrevocably bound her?

Is it because of the characteristics of her people? But in every other country but their own Irishmen have succeeded and attained the highest and most responsible position. Is it because of her religion? But Roman Catholics make good and law-abiding citizens and succeed in all manner of business in other countries. Is it because she has not Home Rule, or that she is governed by an oligarchy as foreign to her as a German Cabinet would be to us? Or is it her land laws which make the peasant's lot so hopeless and lead him to seek interest and excitement outside the dull round of his daily drudgery? Or is it, again, his sunless clime and superabundant rains? All these may contribute to the chronic misery of the land, but more potent than all to unman her people and paralyse every effort made on her behalf is the Drink!

Hear not an Englishman nor a Protestant, but the Roman Catholic Bishop of Ross in Cork:—

> Probably in Ireland is now to be seen more palpable and painful evidences of the effects of drunkenness than in any other country in the world. The whole, or greater part of the social atmosphere reeks of the vice. Invariably the most solemn, as well as the most frivolous, engagements are made in the public-house. There the prosperity and happiness or the poverty and misery of individual lives is determined. All around are unmistakable illustrations of the fact that Ireland never will be really and truly free and prosperous until this dreadful malady is overcome. Alongside a speedily diminishing population there is the steady increase of public-houses. In 1838 there were 15,000 public-houses to supply eight millions of people; now there are 25,500 to supply four and a half million. When one calmly and dispassionately takes into consideration all that this horrible fact involves—the wrecked lives, the miserable mothers, and the starving children, as well as the mental and moral depravity of the community—one would be tempted to despair of the future of our dearly-beloved country did they not realise that, even with all its power, there is one still more omnipotent, and that in due time the fangs of the demon will be drawn and rendered innocuous.

And again:—

> In almost every nation Irishmen occupy prominent and responsible positions, but those invariably are Irishmen who are entirely freed from this vice. It is altogether different in Ireland. Here there are many opportunities for personal advancement, but initiative, enterprise, and will power are wanting, and the harvest goes to people of other lands. Who will dare deny that drunkenness and "boozing" are not the principal causes of this? Until Ireland is sober it never will be really and sincerely free. At present it is, of its own free will, being held in a thraldom immensely more grievous and more degrading than the very worst ever imposed upon it by England. Consequently, all societies or movements having for their object the promotion of the cause of Temperance deserve every possible support and encouragement.

Oh, but you will be willing enough no doubt to admit the evils wrought by drink in Ireland. But what about Leeds, this city in whose very centre stands this chapel to witness for the supreme obligations of personal righteousness and concern for the welfare of our neighbours—this congregation whose effort it should be to provoke all the discordant sects to mutual love, and to create among them all a holy rivalry of good works? What about Leeds? Have you any idea how busy drink is here in our midst? how men and women die of it every day? how homes are wrecked and lives that might be happy and prosperous made miserable by it? how the black curse falls upon the children before yet they can talk? how the mother lies drunk in bed beside her newborn babe? how the children starve in loathsome filth and misery, too abject to complain, because drink robs them of the parent's wage and care and love? I have seen it all; it has frightened, it has sickened me! Drunken husbands, drunken wives, drunken fathers, drunken mothers, drunken sons—Good God! the words sound like blasphemies! Holiest relationships of life, which God himself appropriates, likening himself to husband, father, ay, and mother too, and calling his people bride, wife, and son—so to be degraded to a level lower than that of brutes!

And what can we do? do you ask again. My friends, brothers and sisters mine, brothers and sisters of these wretched men and women who degrade humanity in their person, you can all do much. I am not going to tell you that it is the duty of you all to abstain altogether from that which is cause of so intolerable evils. Very thankful am I that I have myself seen what I am persuaded is the better way, and what experience has taught me is the healthier and happier; but when I consider how long I defended moderate drinking, and how many men better and wiser than myself uphold it as true temperance, I am satisfied that I have no right to lay down my own persuasion for a law to others. I think an ordinarily humane man, who realised all the horrors drink causes, would be a total abstainer. But it is very difficult to realise, and if I partly do so it is only through an exceptional experience.

No. I will not say to you, sign the pledge; give up drink as poison; persuade all you know to do the same. But this I will say. Make a stand, always and everywhere, for temperance! You entertain no fear for yourself; perhaps you are justified. But oh! how you no fear for others, whom your example will encourage or deter. For their sake be more heedful than you think you need be for your own. Drink leads to drink, and abstinence to abstinence. Do we not all of us know it? Let us make our stand! I take mine now, joyfully and with jollity, at total abstinence. Another says it is good for his health or for other reasons to drink in moderation. Be it so; who am I to lay down the law? But the moderate drinker is bound even as the abstainer to combat with all his might this intolerable evil, and lend the force of his example and his word to the side of temperance, the side of God, and of love and of good works, for the which we are born into this world, and by our fidelity to them our lives justified or condemned.

CHARLES HARGROVE.

AN OBSTINATE FALLACY.

SOME years ago an interesting series of papers appeared in the Seed Sower, and was afterwards issued as a pamphlet, under the title "Two Opposing Tendencies." By "tendency" the writer meant the continuous energy of a living idea, and the two ideas whose operation he was criticising are those which we usually designate "Our Freedom" and "Our Unitarianism." He regarded these two as antagonistic ideas, and entered an earnest plea for the abandonment of the second, and the culture of the first, by our society of congregations. The same notion, that freedom and Unitarianism are mutually opposed, finds expression from time to time, and more frequently lurks as an implicit assumption behind some express argument or proposal. It appears, for instance, in the paper recently read before the Midland Christian Union by the Rev. Rudolf Davis. Mr. Davis seems to agree with Mr. Fripp that the two ideas are antagonistic; but Mr. Davis prefers Unitarianism to freedom, and recognises in Unitarianism the organising idea of our churches. "The Churches stand for Unitarianism." The Midland Correspondent of THE INQUIRER endorses Mr. Davis's position. "It has to me every appearance of being the true one."

Let us examine it. The phrase "stand for" is ambiguous. Let us substitute more exact terms. Our churches stand for Unitarianism in the sense that Unitarianism is preached from the pulpits, that they are frequented chiefly, though not exclusively, by Unitarians, and that many of the members are actually engaged, as members of the B. and F.U.A., in propagating Unitarian doctrine. To sum up, the theological influence which these churches severally exert is Unitarian.

In what sense, then, do our churches "stand for" freedom? In a sense which regards, not their present theological influence, but their permanent ecclesiastical basis. They exist for common worship, not for the furtherance of Unitarianism or any other prescribed theological doctrines. Their members are convinced that truth grows, takes purer forms, conquers new realms. They are anxious that their societies should not be precluded, by any premature definition, from gaining the new enlightenment. They recognise that grave dangers attend the preoccupation for any fixed statement, conceived as a final statement, of truth. There is, for instance, the risk of mistaking theology for religion—of resting content with "I hold the watchword," instead of "I serve the host." There is also the risk of insincerity, of forced belief, of an insidious impression of the unreality of religion; these haunt the mind which shapes its secular creed on the knowledge of to-day and its religious creed on that of yesterday. Moreover, the members of our churches are aware that though the love of truth is sacred and secure, the form of truth, even the widest, purest, most mature that has yet been revealed, is transient, mutable, unstable. There can, they say, be no permanent relation between the abiding spirit of worship and any one presentment of human knowledge. So they base their churches on worship, not on doctrine.

"Our Freedom," then, does not merely denote our system of non-doctrinal trusts—that may be, perhaps in a measure it is, the outcome of a happy accident; nor yet merely our determination to abide by that system; it denotes the idea that worship is, and by itself, a proper basis of fellowship. "Our freedom," in this sense, is the organising idea of our churches. And the theological influence of those churches, so based on worship, is at present Unitarian. Where is the inconsistency, the antagonism?

The arguments by which Mr. Davis supports his thesis that our churches are based on Unitarianism cannot overcome the fact that many of them existed, with their present constitution, long before any of their members were Unitarian. We must interpret him to be contending that Unitarianism ought to be the basis of our Church life; that we ought to regard "our freedom" as secondary and subsidiary to "our Unitarianism," and to abandon or limit our freedom if the interests of our prevalent theology can so be furthered. How does he urge his pleas?

In religion, he says, we may not differ from others. It is in their theological beliefs that churches differ. Could a better reason be found for basing our societies upon religion, which unites men, rather than on theology, which divides them? But Mr. Davis is evidently thinking of difference in its logical effect. He wishes to represent Unitarian theology as the differentia of our churches, just as Catholic or Baptist theology is the differentia of certain other churches. This is either a petitio principii, or else a contention that no other differentia can be discerned. But surely a group of churches which is based on worship, not on a particular theology, is by that basis alone sufficiently distinguished from all other churches, in so far as all others are based on a particular theology. The logical argument fails. "Our freedom" is our differentia.

Mr. Davis holds, however, that though "our freedom," when so limited as to conserve Unitarianism, is "another reason" for the existence of our churches, yet since "that other reason could not exist alone," while Unitarianism can, Unitarianism is the chief reason. This is to conceive our freedom as an abstract principle, an unchartered licence. In itself, it is true, mere freedom is not an end. But "our freedom" is not so to be conceived. We use freedom as a safeguard for truth, and a defence against theological preoccupation making inroads on the spirit of worship. Here, surely, we have something which, as a reason for the existence of worshipping societies, can stand alone. "Our freedom," however, cannot be limited without being destroyed. To make it subsidiary to a specific theology is to strike at its very heart.

Mr. Davis makes, in two successive clauses, two utterly inconsistent statements. "Freedom of thought exists to preserve the health of belief; it exists—so far as religion is concerned—solely for the sake of that theological belief which is the expression of a man's religion." Freedom of thought means freedom to think out new thoughts. How can it exist solely for the sake of one particular form of thought? To claim that freedom of thought exists for the sake of Unitarianism is to claim that Unitarianism is either the last, full, perfect revelation of truth, or else that it is so vague and elastic as to be meaningless. Who dares make the first claim? Who to make the other? Freedom exists in order that the expression of a man's religion may be, at any time, in accordance with his highest intuition, in attainment, as well as with his present spiritual desire.

Men are impatient with God. "Why must we work out the truth so slowly and partially?" they cry. "Why does he not tell us the whole secret at once?" Their impatience reaches a point of rebellion. "If God will not draw a line, and say 'here truth ends,' we will," they break out, and draw up their theological trust-deeds. God goes on telling truth to man, but they convince themselves that it is superfluous, or even pernicious. "If we hear the voice of the Lord our God any more, then we shall die." But there is one group of churches which takes as its charter, not the record of earlier oracles, but the voice itself of God, which still is speaking and yet shall speak.

The members of those churches may be convinced and enthusiastic Unitarians. But they will hold even their Unitarianism provisionally. They know that there are yet more potent words to be uttered from on high. Because they rejoice in the light they have, therefore they covet earnestly the gift of more light. If it be true that "our Unitarianism" is a word of God so clearly caught and repeated that it can never be modified, but only supplemented, where is the need to fence it with ecclesiastical protection? If not, how fatal would it be, for the sake of the gift, to shut out the Giver. Let us preach this doctrine by all means, not because our duty to our denomination obliges us so to do, but because we hold it to be true. Let us teach men to worship the God whom we so conceive. But over our church doors let us write not, "Here you must think as we think," but "Here you may worship God."

E. W. LUMMIS.

WE speak of communion with Christ. That is a beautiful thought. Who does commune with Christ? He that asks what is good and right to do, to think, to feel, who goes forward in this work, the Christ-like character, life, soul—he communes with Christ, and is with God. In him is the word fulfilled, "We will come to him and make our abode with him."—Theodore Parker.

THE SCHWARZ DEFENCE FUND.

SIR,—Although I by no means agree with all the attacks of Mr. Schwarz, of Heidelberg, upon Pope Leo XIII. and his Church, I am very glad to contribute to the Defence Fund for the purpose of securing him a fair trial, since, in most cases of the kind in Germany and Austria, people in Mr. Schwarz's position are at a great disadvantage against the practically inexhaustible material resources of the Ultramontane party.

The anti-Christian power of this party has increased very much since 1870. Up to that date they relied on Germany's chief enemies, Austria and France.

To-day a large party in Germany, though they may not avow it openly, expect a break-up among the disunited States of the Austrian Empire when the Emperor Francis Joseph dies, and the Pan-Germanist in Bohemia and Moravia would gladly see these States incorporated with the German Empire. The Tchechisch inhabitants, however, whose forefathers were deprived of their estates by German Romanists at the close of the Hussite wars, have no desire to play in Germany the same part which Ireland has been forced to play towards Great Britain, and would gladly, like the Hungarian Magyars, form an independent kingdom under the Hapsburg Crown.

These dissensions make the Romanist priesthood masters of the situation, and the fear of Ultramontane enmity has a very strong influence on German legislation. I hope, therefore, that sufficient money will be subscribed, not only to secure Mr. Schwarz a fair chance in the law courts, but also, in case of his imprisonment, to help his family.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday Morning, or Thursday at latest.]

Belfast.—Friends in various parts of Great Britain, as well as Ireland, will be glad to learn that the young organist, Miss Blanche Ashworth, daughter of the Rev. Alexander Ashworth, has gained the diploma A.L.C.M. (Associate London College of Music) with high marks.

Birmingham: Old Meeting Church.—On the three last Sunday evenings the Rev. Joseph Wood has replied to some of the statements made by the Bishop of Worcester in his lectures on "The Historical Trustworthiness of the New Testament." The immediate cause of Mr. Wood's action was in the Bishop's declaration that Christ was either God or not a good man, followed by the remarkable assertion that if the evidence of the Gospel miracles did not appear to a man sufficient, it was only because he was lacking in the religious consciousness. Mr. Wood's subjects have been—1. "What Think ye of Christ? Either God or not a good man?" 2. "The Virgin Birth." 3. "The Resurrection." Large congregations assembled on each occasion, and on Sunday evening last Mr. Wood announced that at the close of the service he would hold a new kind of inquiry meeting in the schoolroom to hear and discuss the difficulties that any of his hearers might yet feel with regard to the miracles. About fifty persons met Mr. Wood in the schoolroom directly after the service, and a most interesting conversation took place, lasting more than an hour. The preacher's great object was to show that the essentials of the Christian Faith are not at all bound up with the credibility of miraculous stories, and that everything of moral and spiritual value remains when the miracle stories have been set aside. It was also pointed out that no greater disservice can be done to Christianity than to stake all on the truth of miracles or on the literal and historical accuracy of everything in the Gospel narrative.

Chichester.—On Peace Sunday, at the Eastgate Chapel, there was a special morning Children's Service, with appropriate address by the minister, the Rev. C. A. Hoddinott. At the close each child present received a seasonable gift. In the evening the subject of the discourse was "Peace."

Chowbent.—The annual Carol Service in connection with the school was held on Sunday afternoon, and enjoyed by a crowded attendance of parents, teachers, and scholars. This year the Rev. J. J. Wright read selections from Laura E. Richards's "Melody," the charming story of a blind child, beautiful, with matchless voice and winsome spirit. Last year the story was Mrs. Wiggins's "The Birds' Christmas Carol." Both books deserve to be well known in our schools. The singing-class here gave the carols, &c., and Mr. W. Y. Mather presided at the organ and piano in turn. The usual collection, which proved an increase on all previous years, was taken in aid of our "Children's Homes," i.e., Blackpool, Hucklow, and Winifred House. Towards these the annual "Children's Dance" is also to be given on Monday. At the close of the Carol Service on Sunday afternoon an impressive little ceremony was performed in the young men's classroom, at which all the members of this large class, together with teachers and other friends, were present. This was the unveiling of a memorial picture, Hoffman's "Christ," bearing the following inscription:—"This picture was here placed by the Young Men's Class as a means of cherishing the memories of their fellow-members." Then come the names of two who have recently died, Richard Higham and Joshua Greenhalgh, with dates of birth and death, and other spaces for future names.

Halstead.—The Rev. Dr. Greaves took the service on Dec. 21. The attendance was over seventy; it had been announced that Dr. Greaves would preach on "Why he left the Church of England and became a Unitarian." A band which attends from a neighbouring village gave some good music, and rendered Handel's "Hallelujah Chorus" after the sermon.

Liverpool Sunday School Society.—A meeting was held in the Hope-street Church Hall on Saturday afternoon, the 13th inst., when the teachers of the Hope-street Sunday-school very kindly provided afternoon tea, and the first half-hour was spent in social intercourse. At 5 o'clock the chair was taken by the President (Mr. Frederick Robinson), and the Rev. J. Morley Mills opened a discussion on "How to get more of our elder scholars to become Church members—a question for teachers, Church officers, and ministers." There were about sixty members and friends present, including the Rev. J. Harwood, President of the Sunday School Association, and the Rev. C. Peach (Manchester), and delegates from the Ancient Chapel, Bond-street, Bootle, Garston, Gatacre, Hamilton-road, Hope-street, Liscard, Mill-street, Ullet-road, and Warrington Sunday Schools.

London: Bell-street (Presentation).—At the close of the evening service at the Mission last Sunday, a copy of "The Life and Letters of Dr. Martineau" was publicly handed to the Rev. E. E. Jenkins, it being the conclusion of his temporary and successful engagement. Each volume contains the following inscription, printed in gold:—"A keepsake for the Rev. E. E. Jenkins from the people he has made his friends at the Bell-street Branch of the London Domestic Mission. Presented to him by them to mark their attachment and high appreciation of his services, and to remind him of the too few months he spent amongst them. Dec. 21, 1902."

London: George's-row.—The Rev. F. Summers gratefully acknowledges gifts from "Well-wisher" and a "Reader of the Christian Herald"; also £1 and gifts from "C. J. M.," and 2s. 6d. from "E. A." On Sunday Mr. Z. Toyosaki, Japanese student at Manchester College, preached. On Monday evening the Rev. F. Summers gave a lantern lecture on "The English Lake District."

London: Kilburn.—A successful bazaar was held in the West Hampstead Town Hall on Saturday, Dec. 13, in aid of the funds of the Quex-road Unitarian Church. The bazaar was to have been opened by Mrs. C. Fleetwood Pritchard, the Mayoress of West Hampstead, but owing to the death of her father she was unable to be present. The duty was therefore undertaken by Miss Ida Pritchard, the Mayor, in his robes and chain of office, being present. Mr. David Martineau presided, and on the motion of the Rev. J. E. Stronge, seconded by Mr. Singleton, Miss Ida Pritchard was cordially thanked for her presence. The Mayor, in a sympathetic speech in response, said that as representing the corporation he of course knew no particular sect, but that as a member of that congregation he naturally took a special interest in the occasion. A vote of thanks to the chairman was also passed, and the sale proceeded with great vigour. In the centre of the hall was a Christmas-tree laden with toys, &c., significant of the season. When the returns are completed it is estimated that the amount of £200 aimed at will nearly, if not quite, be realised.

London: Little Portland-street.—The Christmas party of the Social Club was held at the Portland Institute on Saturday last, Dec. 20. There was a large attendance of members and friends, including Mr. T. Smith Osler, the President of the Institute. Under the direction of Mr. E. W. Marten a performance of a version of the "Christmas Carol" was given. Charles Dickens was a member of the Little Portland-street congregation when this was written, in the ministry of the late Rev. Edward Tagart.

Sunderland.—The chapel here has just been renovated at a cost of about £86. The appearance of both the interior and exterior of the building has been very greatly improved. Some slight alterations have been made to the platform with the view of greater adaptation to social gatherings. Reopening services were held on Sundays, Dec. 7 and 14, the Revs. Ottwell Binns, of Scarborough, and H. V. Mills, of Kendal, being the preachers.

Watford.—A resident would be pleased to have the names and addresses of Unitarians living in Watford and the neighbourhood, with a view to starting a Unitarian movement in that town. Communications may be addressed to Mr. Evans, "Meersbrook," Sussex-road, Watford.

IN the conduct of life, habits count for more than maxims, because habit is a living maxim, become flesh and instinct. To reform one's maxims is nothing: it is but to change the title of the book. To learn new habits is everything, for it is to reach the substance of life.—H. F. Amiel.

THE evening is the time to review, not only our blessings, but our actions. A reflecting mind will naturally remember at this hour that another day is gone, and gone to testify of us to our Judge. How natural and useful to inquire what report it has carried to heaven. . . . A religious recollection of our lives is one of the chief instruments of piety. If possible, no day should end without it.—W. E. Channing.

ABERYSTWYTH

("The Biarritz of Wales")

Is highly recommended for invalids, and possesses the most equable temperature, its shore being swept by the Gulf Stream and S.W. breezes of the Atlantic. The drainage is perfect, and the town is supplied with the purest water from Plymlimmon. The late Sir James Clarke, M.D., says: "A fortnight is equivalent to a month's residence in most watering places." Guides on application to the Town Clerk.

MR. JOHN HARWOOD is prepared to give DRAMATIC RECITALS of two hours' duration to Societies connected with our own Churches and Schools, upon exceptional terms. Selections from Dickens's "Christmas Carol," "Cricket on the Hearth" (original adaptations), Shakspere, Colman, Sheridan, and other Authors; also a novel "Lecture," entitled "The Art of Public Recitation: its Humours and Difficulties—a Leaf from my Own Experience," followed by one hour of illustrative Recitals.

Address, Fair View, Pendleton, Manchester.

Yorkshire Training School of Physical Culture.

The above School was opened more than two years ago with the object of providing a centre in the North of England for the professional training of educated women in the Swedish system of Physical Culture.

The minimum course is of two years' duration, and includes the Study of Physiology, Anatomy, Hygiene, Chemistry, Elementary Pathology, Theory of Movements, Practical Subjects, as Gymnastics, Fencing, Swimming, Games, &c.

That such a centre is needed seems to be proved by the fact that the first student trained by this School was, on the completion of her course, appointed under the Bradford Board as Instructress on Physical Culture to their schools.

For prospectus and full information, apply to the PRINCIPAL, 21, Eaton-road, Ilkley, Yorks.

Biographies by Miss Frances E. Cooke.

The Story of St. Francis of Assisi. Cloth, 1s. net. Postage 2d.

"Perhaps now, more than ever," Miss Cooke says in a brief introductory note, "we need the kindling influence of great aims and lofty ideals, and it would surely be well for ourselves and for the world about us if we were to try to carry the spirit of St. Francis into our daily lives."

The Story of John Greenleaf Whittier. Cloth, 1s. net. Postage 2d.

The CHRISTIAN WORLD says: "It was a good idea to write the story of Whittier so that young people should be stimulated by its beauty and interest. This is here done in a brief and unpretentious way, which should achieve its object, and form an excellent preparation for a fuller study of the man and his work."

The Story of Dorothea Lynde Dix. Cloth, 1s, net. Postage 2d.

The NEW AGE says: "Miss Cooke is a well-known writer of short biographies, and she has just added to the list a delightful story of the life and work of Dorothea Dix. The story of the noble devotion and self-sacrifice of this brave, beautiful soul is told in a way that cannot fail to do anyone good who reads it. The magnificent work done for the poor and friendless lunatics by Dorothea Dix places her in the front rank of the world's latter-day saints."

Theophilus Lindsey and his Friends. Cloth. 1s. net. Postage 3d.

The Author says: "The stories of Lindsey and his friend Dr. Priestley, which are combined in this little volume, are almost unknown to young people of the present day. Yet, because of their faithfulness to duty and fearless search after truth, these men should be lasting examples for all time, and should appeal to the reverence even of those who differ from them in opinion."

Noble Workers. Cloth, 1s. net. Postage 3d.

Short sketches of lives of Dr. Chalmers, Mary Ware, Thomas Thrush, Michael Angelo Buonarroti, Frederick Christopher Perthes, Catherine Cappe, John Withers Dowson, Joseph Sturge, and Lloyd Garrison.

The Story of Theodore Parker. Cloth, 1s. net. Postage 3d.

The SCHOOLMASTER says: "Although written for young people, there is much in this volume to attract those of maturer years, and teachers who are earnest in their work will find much to interest them in the career of Parker, himself a teacher, in whose heart the love of children was great to the overflow."

The Story of William Ellery Channing. Cloth, 1s. net. Postage 2d.

UNITY (U.S.A.) says: "The story of Dr. Channing told for boys and girls, terse, plain, pointed and attractive, a book which is sure to find its way into our young folks' Libraries, and should be omitted from no School Library."
